John H. Booth, our associate secretary, will visit all the southern conventions this year excepting Florida and will address the students of the College of the Bible and Transylvania University on the 27th and address the students of Johnson College on the 29th. He will also visit the churches that are delinquent on church extension loans in all the southern states.

All church extension offerings should be sent to G. W. Muckley, 603 New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The Graded Lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' and Primary Departments are fully completed. Three of the four Junior grades are complete. Fourth year Junior pupils may use either third year Junior lessons or first year Intermediate. Two of the four Intermediate grades are complete, and these materials may be used for the entire Intermediate Department. For Senior and Adult Departments, Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus" is provided. Other Adult classes may use Dr. Strong's "The Gospel of the Kingdom."]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

EVERY LESSON WRITER IS A RECOGNIZED AUTHORITY IN THE INTERDENOMINATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL WORLD!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that co-operation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

Concerning Baptism

An Editorial

CHICAGO

—The Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has begun a nation-wide campaign in every state for one-day-in-seven for industrial workers. The first effective measure of this kind to be passed by a state legislature was passed at the last session of the Connecticut legislature, the bill having been introduced by the secretary of the Federal Council Commission.

—The appointment by the Federal Council of a Commission on Peace and Arbitration will probably be the third link in an international chain of church brotherhood in the interest of international peace and arbitration. There is already a joint committee representing the churches of England and the churches of Germany, and between the two sections of the committee international visits have been exchanged between German and English pastors and laymen. During the past summer, the Social Service Secretary of the Federal Council, Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, Ph. D., conferred with members of the English committee in London and of the German committee in Berlin, receiving general expressions of a desire that the alliance should also embrace the United States. This will probably be brought about through the Federal Council Commission, and will mean, perhaps, the beginning of a world-wide alliance among the Christian churches.

—Preaching at the installation of Dr. Merrill in Brick church, New York, Dr. Van Dyke summarily defined the great present demand on the church in one well-laden sentence: "The church must renew her power to convict men of sin and revive her power to convince men of salvation." He hoped that every Christian temple in the land would become a place "where no self-righteous, proud man can feel at ease and from which no humble, penitent man shall go away uncomforted."

—Silvester Horne, when he got back to England, told the newspaper reporters that in America he found no city church work to compare in effectiveness with the great mission churches of London, Liverpool and Manchester—of which naturally he must regard his own church as an outstanding example. He added: "The only place I saw that was really getting the man in the street is the Labor temple in New York." It appears that the thing which Mr. Horne admired most in America is the public school system.

—A young man entering a theological seminary was asked by the committee why he chose the ministry as a calling. He replied that he had heard a voice saying, "The Lord hath need of him." The committee asked again if he knew under what circumstances those words were used by Jesus. "Yes," he answered, "it was when he sent Peter and John after the ass."

—"Rev." George F. Hall of Chicago, whose financial capital appears to be chiefly deposited in that "Rev.," is now said to have abandoned Texas as the place providentially designed for money-making by the godly and at present recommends Florida as the more favorable and more blessed spot for the multiplication of the dollars of the poor and pious. By this time, however, anybody who puts money into Hall's "Rev." has only himself to blame for what happens. The prudent will prefer investments recommended by something better than the authorship of a volume of flamboyant sermons.—The Continent.

THE WORLD OF THE WORLD

Be of good cheer, brave spirit; steadfastly
Serve that low whisper that thou hast served; for know,
God hath a select family of sons
Now scattered wide through earth and each alone,
Who are thy spiritual kindred, and each one,
By constant service to that inward law,
Is wearing the sublime proportions
Of a true monarch's soul. Beauty and strength,
The riches of a spotless memory,
The eloquence of truth, the wisdom got
By searching of a clear and loving eye
That seeth as God seeth. These are their gifts,
And Time, who keeps God's word, brings on the day
To seal the marriage of these minds with thine, Thine everlasting lovers. Ye shall be
The salt of all the elements, world of the world.

A New Book of Vital Religious Importance

The Divinity of Christ

By EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Dr. Ames' Book will be Widely Read

Previous announcements of the price of this book are hereby withdrawn, and the price fixed at 75 cents. This is due to the fact that the publishers have made a more attractive and expensive volume than was at first contemplated.

The Winning of Character

One of the favorite inquiries of the Greek schools was, What is the highest good? There was high debate among the philosophers over the question. Nor is it easy of answer. Different sorts of people would give it various replies.

Primitive man would have said the most desirable thing was good hunting and fishing. At the dawn of civilization men would have affirmed that it was the favor of the gods. The typical Greek of the golden age would have said it was the laurel crown of victory in the Olympian games. The Roman of the upper class would have insisted that power was the best of possessions; while the common man of the street would have satisfied himself with bread and the games. The Hebrew of the classic period believed the highest good to be found in long life and many sons. The scholastic believed knowledge to be the priceless possession. The modern world is convinced that wealth is the climax of desirable things.

But the Christian, who has caught something of the splendor of Jesus' vision of life knows that there is but one thing that is supremely worthful, and that is character. And the Christian world at its best, in the sanity and devotion of its inward experience, has always known that this is true. Nothing in life is for a moment comparable to the possession of a noble character, in which appear the virtues which the centuries have come to hold in reverence, and which found their complete embodiment and illustration in the life of Jesus.

The Bible is the most important of books for life because it contains the world's greatest record not merely of characters but of character. In it are set forth the insight and vision of Abraham, the discipline and achievement of Jacob, the purity of Joseph, the persistence of Moses, the courage of Joshua, the generosity of David, the manliness of Jonathan, the audacity of Job, the tenderness of Hosea, the devotion of Peter, the sincerity of Timothy, the gentleness of Barnabas, the enthusiasm of Paul, and the completeness and supremacy of Jesus. Nor are the women of the Bible lacking in the qualities which inspire to the attainment of noble character.

There are two standards in accordance with which character has been valued. One of them makes it consist in standing, position, conformity. This was the determining factor in the Judaism of Jesus' day. To be of the right genealogical line was highly important. "We have Abraham for our father," said the Pharisees, as if descent from a particular line was of the slightest value in the securing of character. Correctness of knowledge was deemed a prerequisite to the divine favor. "This people that knoweth not the law is accursed," said the same zealous advocates of conventional goodness.

The due performance of ritual acts, such as washings, fasting, prayer and sacrifice was an additional means of procuring a proper standing. And the profession of the orthodox beliefs, such as those in angels, spirits, a physical resurrection and a day of judgment, were essential to the state of virtue.

In contrast with this fictitious type of righteousness Jesus brought into the world a wholly different standard. He insisted that character could never depend on such things as family descent, knowledge, outward forms or credal holdings. He showed that people who gave their attention to such things had no time or interest left for the really important things of character, such as justice, mercy and love.

To the inquiring lawyer he pointed out the fact that the only things which were essential to a good character were love to God and love to man. To the young man who asked what he should do to obtain life, Jesus proposed a testing act of supreme commitment to the program of divine and human friendship. To him the real proof of the right kind of character was the centering of mind, heart and will upon the divine purpose as he revealed it.

He called men to himself; not to a body of belief, nor a form of obedience, nor an organization. He wanted them to share his vision of life, his faith in God and in man, and his joy in a redemptive life. "Have this mind in you which was also in Christ Jesus," wrote Paul, thereby confessing that the possession of the attitude and spirit of Jesus is the very essence of salvation.

The early Christians accepted this view of their relation to Jesus. In their interpretation of the new life they rightly placed the emphasis not on standing or conformity but on character. To accept the leadership of the Lord, to take him seriously as the ideal and pattern of their lives, to feel the supreme joy that loving him brought to them, and to undertake with passion and consecration the realization of his program for the world, was to them the holy content of Christian faith. Anything less than this would have been too small to satisfy them. They laid hold of the virtues which they saw in the Master and made them their own. The enthusiasm of a great desire and purpose filled them. They counted nothing else of moment but to be "in Christ," in his confidence, his circle of friends, his plan of human completion.

From this inward motive of securing a character like that of Jesus came all outward behavior. They banded themselves together as friends of the Lord, disciples, Christians. They claimed the rite of baptism as the formal sign of their purpose to win the holy life. They observed the Lord's day as a time congenial to the development of the virtues which were in Christ. They kept the holy meal, because it was a symbol of the nourishment of their souls from the perfect life of the Savior. In all things they labored to attain the end of likeness to him in spirit and conduct, that they might be worthy of his friendship.

Nor did they claim these virtues as the result of their mere efforts at imitation. To them the divine spirit, the spirit of Jesus, was the dispenser of the graces of character. Whatever gifts and interests they possessed were of divine bestowment. Submitting themselves in humility to the guidance of their Lord, they gave to him and his regenerating power the full credit of their holier life. The sacred mystery of a new love was overshadowing them, and they were no longer their own, but the choice possession of the Christ.

But when church dialectic began to devise definitions and explanations of the glowing life of love, the simplicity that was in Christ gave way to metaphysical speculations. Theories of the atonement were proposed. Explanations of the transforming power of divine love in the heart were attempted. It was stated in terms of legal procedure. The divine mercy overlooked the sin of man, they said, or made for it a compensation in the costly payment of Christ's death. Or faith, a divinely given and almost magical thing, was implanted in the sinful soul, they affirmed, and thus salvation came. Or the favor of God was to be won by conforming to some authoritative rite or ordinance, a theory which carried as far as to the belief in baptismal regeneration.

Such were the ways in which salvation was defined. Not one of them laid hold upon the central fact that character alone is salvation. To possess the spirit and ideals of Jesus is to be saved, and nothing else can for a moment be substituted. Yet the church was for centuries, in many of its sections, obsessed with the idea that salvation was some supernatural thing, procured by the death of Christ, and involving only in slight degree the possession of the Christly virtues. People were supposed to be "saved" because they believed certain things, or belonged to a certain organization, or had conformed to certain ordinances. And all the time the quality of life they were living was supposed to be of lesser value than these things.

In harmony with these superficial definitions of salvation there are still teachers in the church who would make the test of the Christian life the acceptance of a particular opinion, such as a special view of the divinity of Christ, or the fact of the virgin birth, or a precise statement regarding the nature of Christ's resurrection, or a belief in the miracles of the Lord, or in the evidential value of his references to the Old Testament.

The Brewers' Convention

The united protest of the Christian peoples of the entire nation struck a deaf ear at Washington, and Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Agriculture, acted the part arranged for him in the recent brewers' congress held in Chicago. As far as actual participation in the congress is concerned, his part was brief, consisting of a short address of welcome to the foreign delegates. The brewers made Mr. Wilson honorary president of the congress for the express purpose of securing the official recognition of the United States Government, and they got it. Secretary Wilson is reported to have said previous to his official act, "I am simply acting as the representative of the United States Government in welcoming delegates from the Old World to this country." Mr. Wilson thinks the Prohibitionists are theorists and apparently excuses himself on the ground that he is practical. Speaking of those who opposed his acceptance of the honorary presidency, he says, "They are honest, conscientious, well-meaning people probably with the best of motives, but the great American government cannot be run upon the theories they hold." In striking contrast are the words of Percy Andreæ, president of the Brewers' Association: "In this country the so-called temperance movement has fallen into the hands of the most intemperate people of the nation, men suffering from what I describe only as chronic moral inebriation, men utterly devoid of reasoning powers, largely lacking in the most elementary knowledge and education, and, worse than all, in only too many cases prompted solely by the commercial benefits they derive from the cause they make a profession of championing." Possibly those words will produce a smile, but they are serious, for they are characteristic of the falsehoods which the brewers are using to fight prohibition. The comment of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate is refreshingly pointed: "What a shame that temperance people are so ignorant and are not actuated by the disinterested, humane, patriotic, and philanthropic motives which burn in the breasts and illuminate the faces of 'our brewers!' The greed of the men and women in the temperance ranks will be the ruin of the nation, doubtless!"

The War in Tripoli

As was confidently predicted from the start by the military critics, Italy has experienced little difficulty in disposing of the weak and demoralized Turkish forces in Tripoli, destroying or capturing the Turkish vessels, and driving the army inland. Then her difficulties began. Italy had, according to the last authentic reports, landed about 40,000 men in Tripoli, and has a reserve force of some 10,000 men at home—ready to send at a moment's notice if they are needed. Press dispatches indicate that this force will be needed. They report that the Turkish soldiers have been reinforced by a strong detachment of Arab cavalry and have pressed the Italian invading army so hard that it has been forced to assume a defensive program only. The Turkish navy is so weak that Turkey has not dared risk a dash for Tripoli with a relief force, and Italy is restrained by the attitude of the other European powers from carrying the war into the Turkish territory on the continent of Europe. Italy is reported to have officially declared Tripoli annexed and it is reasonable to suppose this true. Just or unjust as it may be, the natives are more or less passive in the matter, and there is said to be little hostility against the Italians. Some good is bound to come of the war anyway. Slavery received its death blow in its last stronghold when Italy officially declared all slaves in Tripoli free. This the Turks ostensibly did in 1900, but her officials winked at the continuance of the custom and slavery thrived practically as before. Italy may partially redeem herself for her injustice in seizing Tripoli if she enforces the emancipation proclamation.

Orville Wright's Newest Achievements

Those who have witnessed the flight of aviators in the aëroplane may remember a vague sense of uneasiness stealing over them as they watched the bird-men soaring, now steadily, now teetering and dipping dangerously in the uncertain air currents. Those flights seemed almost supernatural, yet the ever-present element of great danger to life robbed the sight of some of its impressiveness and left one with the conclusion that until the art of flying should have been greatly perfected in the way of better control, the flying machine would be of little practical value either to the pleasure seeker or the business man. Toward stability the inventive genius of leading aëroplane pioneers in both Europe and America constantly have been wrestling. Various balancing devices, including the gyroscope, have been tried but the very rigidity which these devices produced defeated the object for which their use was suggested, and they were abandoned. Now Orville Wright comes forward with a device which he claims will produce fore and aft stability automatically, thus solving one-half of the problem. Mr. Wright has so adjusted his machine that, should any part of it suddenly drop the added pressure on that part would automatically bring into operation the stabilizing device. In order to give it a thorough test Mr. Wright is conducting a series of experiments at Manteo, N. C., and is reported to be highly satisfied with the results. A most interesting feature of these experiments is the fact that they are being tried on a glider, that is, an aëroplane specially constructed without an engine or other motive power. Mr. Wright has not only secured results that are highly satisfactory to him in demonstrating the practicability of the automatic balance, but, with a strong wind, he has risen with the glider and remained practically stationary high in the air over the same spot for a minute, something never before accomplished. Again and again this wizard of the air rose from the ground with his powerless glider and hovered in the rush of the gale within a few rods of his starting point, retaining perfect control of his machine practically all of the time. This is indeed wonderful, and if the problem of lateral stability can also be solved, the day of the aëroplane will be at hand.

One View of the Steel Trust Case

Considerable uncertainty in financial centers was occasioned by rumors that the United States Steel Corporation was preparing voluntarily to dissolve into its constituent companies in order to escape prosecution by the United States Government. Though flatly denied, the rumors persisted because the officials of the corporation believed the corporation was not in reality a monopoly, since it manufactures far less than the total of all the steel produced in the United States. They were of the opinion that by readjusting the affairs of the corporation it could continue to operate without dissolving and still be within the provisions of the Sherman law as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court in the oil and tobacco cases. Such a reorganization the corporation probably would have undertaken to avoid prosecution by the government had not such action been anticipated by the government in starting proceedings to compel dissolution. The case is a peculiar one. The commissioner of corporations in his report does not find the steel corporation either manufactures nearly all of the total steel output or that it is endeavoring to crowd its competitors out of business. He does find that, "In so far as the steel corporation's position in the entire iron and steel industry is of monopolistic character, it is chiefly through its control of ore holding and the transportation of ore." It is specified that the steel corporation has lease holdings of iron ore estimated to exceed 300,000,000 tons lying along the Great Northern and Northern Pacific railways. These holdings are practically untouched, while the company controls immense deposits in northern Minnesota. It is here that the greater part of the ore now used is mined, and the steel corporation controls the railroads which are the only means of transporting ore to the docks on the great lakes. Competitors have been able to get all the metal they desire but they are compelled to pay one cent a ton, per mile, to have it transported to the great lakes. This rate is so high that it is said to yield the steel company an income double that secured by other railways in operating similar equipment. This revenue, it is charged, amounts to a rebate in the carrying of the steel corporation's own ore. On the steel corporation's monopoly of ore holdings and its transportation control, then, the government largely bases its case. The officials of the corporation professed a willingness to release a large part of their lease holdings on ore land in the far Northwest, and to reduce the rates of transportation in northern Minnesota 30 per cent, but the federal officials are not satisfied and will prosecute for dissolution. This is the first case to come up under the new supreme court interpretation of the Sherman anti-trust law. It will be several months before the steel corporation is compelled to dissolve, if at all, so stockholders have little occasion for undue alarm.

—A call has been issued for an Illinois Christian Citizenship convention to be held in Chicago November 20, 21. One special object of the convention is to inaugurate a state-wide movement to secure the legality of Bible reading in the schools of the state. The convention will consider the necessary steps to take in order to move according to law, and the best legal advice will be sought that the movement may stand the test of the courts. The movement is one in which every patriot will have an interest.

Presbyterian

A Worthy Brotherhood Aim

The Continent feels that the brotherhood movement in this country lacks the vigor of the British brotherhood movement. Over there they have the tremendous social motto "One as good as another; to every man a brother." In this country the brotherhood movement has often been introduced into a congregation with but ill-defined notions as to what it should really do. Indeed national officers in some cases have scarcely known. The Continent thinks it knows as the following indicates:

Far too much divided and subdivided is the church in this land, as everybody knows; it endures untold frustrations from being snipped up into denominational bits and sectional bits and theological bits and social bits.

And it is far too much inclined to worship the dignities of the present world. None of us can deny that the church is ten times more vain over the rich man and the prominent man and the brilliant man, when they join its ranks, than over the ninety and nine common people whom it receives.

If only in both these things an utter change could come over the church, what a revival it would be—if first in the church's consciousness stood its own unity in the Lord and after that the unity of humanity in one like need for his saving power—if a sublime contempt of worldly estimations left it aware only of the even and equitable estimations of God.

Should the brotherhoods set themselves to preach these things, to illustrate them, to put them in practice, to enforce them until no Christian dared defy the law of such mighty ideas, would men longer be asked whether brotherhoods are worth while?

The Cost of a Convert.

Shall the different states enter into competition to lower the cost of converts? Is it Christian for one denomination to boast that it can make a convert for fewer dollars than any other denomination? The following reflections from the Presbyterian Banner are suggestive:

Rev. William Sunday has given out some calculations as to the cost of conversions in different cities, and according to his scale it costs $620 to save a soul in Indianapolis, $545 in New York, $450 in Boston, $395 in Chicago, and then a big drop to $78 in New Orleans and $73 in Atlanta. Whether this means that souls are worth more in Indianapolis and New York than in New Orleans and Atlanta or whether preachers are cheaper and evangelistic machinery less expensive in the latter than in the former cities, is not indicated, and these cities are left to figure out the cause of this difference in the scale of cost for themselves. The figures not only do not indicate this cause, but they do not indicate anything of significance with any degree of approximation. Such rough averages cannot take into account the varying conditions and results in these cities, and are really worth nothing. The value of even a single soul cannot be computed in dollars and cents, and the church has no interest in such misleading and sordid calculations. Jesus Christ did not calculate the value of his sacrifice when he laid down his life for men, and his followers in so far as they are his followers have the same spirit. We once heard a Baptist minister contend that statistics showed that a Baptist dollar will convert more heathen than any other dollar and that therefore the Lord favored the Baptists, but we think that few of his brother ministers and people would believe in or sympathize with such a vain and vulgar argument. We fear "Billy" Sunday runs too much to dollars and cents in his views of Christian work, and we wish he would cease from his calculations.

Baptist

A Baptist's Attitude to Christian Union.

The apologists for the present denominational order are not all to be found in any one communion. The Baptist we quote voices a point of view that still lingers in many of the older bodies. It will be of interest in the turn it makes upon some sayings familiar among Disciples. In all this we fail to see how ultimate Christian unity shall suffer because of union. We quote from the Watchman:

Denominations will exist to the end of time, but Christ's Spirit working among his people will make them one in heart and spirit, though they may be housed in many folds. The flock belongs to the shepherd; the fold is subordinate. He loves his sheep; he doesn't say anything about the fold. Doctor Hovey said, "The idea of the fold is subordinate to that of the flock. It is the flock which belongs to the shepherd, and sheep from many folds are to become one flock, instead of flocks that belong to many shepherds being sheltered in one fold, as is often the case in Palestine."

Let our motto be, "In essentials unity; in non-essentials liberty; in all things charity."

There is such a thing as unity in diversity. God never made two things alike. In his plan for the redemption of the world he may have intended that men shall work for their fellows under the banner of many denominations.

In the same issue of the Watchman we find a story which better reflects the spirit of our age:

It is told of John Wesley, that once, in the vision of the night, he found himself as he thought, at the gates of hell. He knocked and asked, "Are there any Roman Catholics here?" Yes, was the answer. Any Church of England men? Yes. Any Presbyterians? Yes. Any Independents? Yes. Any Wesleyans? Yes. Disappointed and dismayed, especially at the last reply, he turned his steps upward and found himself at the gates of paradise; and he repeated the same questions. "Any Wesleyans here? No. Any Presbyterians? No. Any Church of England men? No. Any Baptists? No. Whom have you here then? he asked in astonishment. "We know nothing here," was the reply, "of any of those names you have mentioned. The only name of which we know anything here is Christian. We are all Christians here."

United Brethren

An Ancient Notion Revived.

It was once common among Protestants to make the book of Revelation furnish abundant testimony against Roman Catholics. Religious newspapers have not given much space to such a notion in recent years. If Rome is anti-Christ, then we Protestants have all sprung out of an anti-Christ movement for we are historically related to it. The following appeared in the Religious Telescope:

First, the anti-Christ "denieth that Jesus is the Christ." (I John 2:22.) We know that many Protestants say it is a libel to apply this to Rome papal. Does not the Douay Bible say that Jesus is the Christ? Does not the Council of Trent declare it? Do not her priests affirm it? Yes, all that is true. But anti-Christ does that, too, A thief's denial when caught with the goods is not evidence. A murderer's denial is not accepted, when proof positive establishes his guilt.

Congregational

Elementary Instruction on the Minister's Salary.

"It is a scandal on the Church of Christ, if in an age of boundless wealth, any of its ministers are compelled to work financially handicapped and tortured. A denomination that does not care for its own is something worse than an infidel." These are the closing words of a well-paid New York pastor, Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, in an article which handles the preacher's salary question without gloves. Dr. Jefferson believes that a great deal of elementary instruction is yet needed in many quarters. "There are laymen who evidently have never grasped the New Testament doctrine that all Christians are kings and priests unto God, that all men alike, whether clergymen or laymen, are servants of God, and brothers of one family. Christian farmers, bankers, lawyers, physicians, editors and business men have no more right to large incomes and luxuries than the man who ministers to them in spiritual things. What they pay the minister is not an alms, but a debt." The minister is slow to demand Christian justice with respect to his compensation. The chauffer speaks out, so does the gardener, the bookkeeper, the foreman, the cook. But the minister's position is more delicate, made so mainly by the prevailing conception of his salary as a piece of charity rather than a straight out debt. Dr. Jefferson's article appears in The Congregationalist. A paragraph or two of his "elementary instruction" follows:

No doubt one root of the trouble is the inconsiderateness of Christian people. Many of them do not think. What is everybody's business is nobody's business, and the result is that many a church is treating its minister shabbily when not a man in the church has the least intention of doing anything mean. No one of them would be inhuman, and yet all of them together are guilty of a refined species of cruelty. It is a blackening revelation of a church's character when it keeps a minister year after year on a starvation salary, and then suddenly discovers, when he receives a call to a more generous church, that it is able to pay far more than it ever before offered. What must be thought of the Christian culture of a church which wears a minister out on an inadequate salary, and then offers a new minister, not a whit superior, in order to get him, a sum that was never given to the old? Many a church needs arousing on this subject.

The nerves of a man's mind are more or less paralyzed when he feels that he is suspended above the jaws of destitution, knowing neither the day nor the hour when he may drop into them. No conscientious man can do good intellectual work if his heart is torn by anxieties concerning the payment of his bills, or if there is no margin between income and outlay, allowing him to put aside each year at least a little against that rainy day which is sure to come. It is galling for a man ordained to stand before the community as a moral teacher, to have creditors in the town unpaid. It is humiliating for any man to be obliged to skimp and scrape in order to eke out just a bare existence. A church owes it to its pastor to see that he is safeguarded against those pecuniary embarrassments which wear out a man's life.

The Faith of Our Childhood and Our Faith of Today

The faith of the child which we have been taught to admire is that of the unspoiled child of loving and wise parents. Such a child can look with confidence to its parents for protection and guidance. It has never appealed in vain for needed help. But it has had to learn that many of its desires cannot be satisfied immediately and in the way that seems best to it. Its faith is incomplete until it has learned to trust the wisdom and goodness of its parents.

The faith of mature years is not altogether different from that of childhood. We are in a world whose ongoing is not much affected by what we do and think. The world is too big for us to control. The man of faith finds his place in the world order and does his work with energy and enthusiasm. He does not withdraw from active life in bad humor when he cannot have his own way. He believes that honest effort has value even if its results are not what he had hoped they would be. He is willing to submit to the discipline of life that will give him a new sense of values.

The faith of manhood is that of knowledge. The man knows that the world has in it evil as well as good. Its brutality, its vileness, and its faithfulness have been forced upon his attention. He has been the victim of fraud. He has felt the sting of ingratitude. Yet he believes in the goodness of God and in the goodness of man, for he has knowledge. There is, it is true, a kind of knowledge that undermines faith, the kind men obtain when they seek to gratify appetite and passion. The right sort of knowledge is the reward of those who have as their first aim the promotion of friendship, love and truth. It is impossible for men to get faith by self-seeking.

The enrichment of faith appears in increased self-control. The man has more interests than the child and consequently he feels restraint from more sources. He not only puts the curb upon appetite and passion but also upon ambition and pride. To the man of faith the faults of other men are not opportunities for pride and for harsh judgments. They are rather reminders of the weakness common to all men and they call for sympathetic and honest treatment. As faith grows in strength and richness, its expression becomes less boisterous. It reckons its worth in terms of positive achievement and sets little store by loud complaint against things as they are. These complaints are too often merely evidence of lack of self-restraint. Faith works in season, out of season, and waits.

Steadfastness, or constantcy, was much admired by the ancient Romans. Fickle, wavering, shifting men and nations they despised. They demanded that ideals be put into laws and institutions. By the laws and institutions of his country the true Roman was ready to live and for them he did not hesitate to die. This heroic spirit Christianity approves. It is an aggressive, warlike faith. Its aim is the conquest of the whole human race. There are no national boundaries which it feels bound not to pass. Hence its steadfastness is that of progress. Neither the child nor the man is content to hold what has been gained, both reach out for new possessions. What is impulse in the child is organized knowledge and love in the man.

Oneness of faith and community of labor create and increase love. We can understand the man who is doing the kind of work we are doing. We know how he is tested. If there is opposition to an organization to which we belong, we have for this reason a stronger attachment to its members. The early church was bitterly persecuted. The love of its members one for another was thereby increased. Perhaps the need of the church of today is opposition. There is no doubt that it needs the hostility of all the forces of evil. The aggressive church has this hostility. It is something to sing together on the Lord's day the songs of our faith. But if each of us knows that the man by his side is his trusted helper in some enterprise that requires intelligence and courage of a high order, he will think of that man's live as a part of his own.

Love for all men is the fundamental virtue. Without it we cannot think clearly nor act with justice. This love is an achievement, it is not given outright. Men must have knowledge that love may be complete. They must know that sorrow and pain and sin are the portion of all. They must know that no man can be indifferent to the woe of another without injury to himself. This love, once acquired, is the greatest thing in the world, and the faith that accompanies it is more beautiful than the faith of the child. [Midweek Service, Nov. 15. 2 Pet. 1:1-21.] S. J.

The Meaning of Baptism

VII—CONCERNING INFANT BAPTISM.

The questions raised by Rev. Z. T. Sweeney on the subject of infant baptism, and to which we have replied on Our Readers' Opinions page prompt us to use the occasion for a further statement of a constructive rather than a polemical nature. In doing this we disarrange the program of the series of articles on The Meaning of Baptism, in which a place had been made several weeks later for a chapter on infant baptism. Next week the series will be resumed at the point where our last article left off.

The Christian Century is opposed to the practice of infant baptism and favors the practice of a ceremony of infant dedication or recognition in which the parents shall solemnly give their child to God, and the church shall recognize and assume its share of responsibility with the parents for the child's spiritual welfare.

We are opposed to infant baptism because, historically, baptism was at the first administered only to adults of accountable years. There is not the slightest New Testament precedent for the baptism of infants. Within a half century after the death of the last apostle, there was a controversy in the church between those who would make thirty years (the age at which the Lord was baptized) and those who would make fourteen years (the age of puberty) the minimum age of candidates for baptism. Historically, then, baptism was a rite applying only to adults.

Again, the New Testament prerequisites of baptism place the ordinance beyond the reach of infants. The New Testament does not call for the baptism of any save penitent believers.

Again, the nature of the church, in its original conception and in its actual character, bars the initiation of infants. The church is a voluntary organization in the midst of society, set for the accomplishment of certain moral ends in the lives of its members and in the social order. Its strength as a moral organization depends upon the voluntary moral purpose of its membership. The standard of its moral purpose is largely determined by the initiation requirements. If these requirements of membership are conceived as something other than the voluntary self-commitment of a penitent believer, the spiritual tone and power of the church is bound to be lowered. Membership becomes more or less hereditary, and consequently prefunctory. Personal moral decision tends to be displaced by a magical notion of baptism in which efficacy is imputed to the water or priestly authority or some other agent entirely external to the individual "baptized." The church is a moral order; no one can be initiated into it except by a moral act of his own.

Moreover, the nature of the child in the light of Christ's plain teaching makes it already a partaker of the grace which is mediated to others by baptism. "Of such are the Kingdom of Heaven," said Jesus. The child is the model of every follower of Christ, and needs no further induction. The practice of infant baptism arose in connection with the totally un-Christian notions of original sin which began to be formulated in the early centuries of the church. Among evangelical protestant churches where this corrupt doctrine has become incredible, the ceremony of magically cleansing the child from sin in baptism has no further reason for being practiced. No conceivable benefit can accrue to the child from it.

And finally, the most casual observation will discover the fact that, except in those churches strongly dominated by the doctrine of original sin, the really essential part of infant baptism takes place not when the child is said to be baptized, but at confirmation. Initiation into the church is not complete until the child is confirmed. The statistcal reports of membership in the evangelical churches —Presbyterian, Congregational, Methodist and the rest,—do not as a rule include "baptized" infants. They are not so enrolled until they of their own accord assume as their own act that which parents and sponsors performed for them in their infancy.

This, however, is a needless and unwarranted confusion of terms. Baptism has a perfectly plain meaning in the New Testament, in history and in the creeds of the churches. It means induction, initiation into the body of Christ. But if the actualization of this induction in the case of infants who are said to be baptized is reserved until the infant becomes personally responsible, why call by the name of baptism an act in which the child has no moral part at all? It would be less incongruous to call the later ceremony baptism, for although the historic and proper symbol of immersion in water is lacking in confirmation, there is in it the essential spiritual substance of baptism, namely, the self-commitment of the candidate and his actual induction into the church.

The fact that the candidate must adopt as his own not alone the moral pledges which his parents and sponsors made on his behalf, but the outward physical symbol by which these pledges were signalized, should suggest that the symbolic value of the physical act would be heightened were it deferred until the candidate could intelligently participate in it. If the ceremony of initiation is to become unequivocal the physical symbolic act should be brought into connection with the spiritual experience as immediately and vitally as possible.

These are our reasons for standing opposed to infant baptism.

The reasons why we favor a ceremony of dedication and recognition participated in by the church, either in the public service or through the minister in the homes of his parish, are somewhat as follows:

The birth of a child is a great spiritual event in the experience of its parents. It is no less natural to turn to the church in the awe of that hour than to turn to the church in the hour of bereavement, or the hour of marriage. The emotions that are released by the entrance into the home of a newborn babe are essentially religious.

The feelings of gratitude, of hope, of awe, of responsibility, of tender love all lift the soul toward God. And these emotions rush toward symbolic, ceremonial expression as if by instinct. The universal prevalence of some form of ritual at the birth of a child among civilized people and primitive tribes, in modern and ancient times, inside the pale of Christianity and among pagans and heathen, testifies to the reality and strength of this instinct.

Only among the relatively small section of Christendom of Baptist belief, to whom infant baptism is repugnant, do we find parenthood robbed of this most natural sacrament. With the Baptist view of baptsm as applicable only to those who can make an intelligent confession of sin and a profession of faith in Christ, we perfectly agree. But in abrogating the practice of infant baptism it was a mistake to leave home and church disconnected at this point where there are so many reasons for the most vital relationship.

The caution in the German proverb against pouring out the baby with the bath is pertinent in a very literal sense, and should have been heeded by Baptist reformers. There was no need for the church to let go the baby because it must let go the baptism. The parental instinct which finds misdirected expression in the rite of infant baptism is a true and valid instinct. It should be nurtured and satisfied by the church instead of being ignored and repressed by it.

A simple ceremony in which, the joy and obligation of parenthood having been impressively dwelt upon by the minister, the parents should solemnly dedicate their child to God and pledge themselves in the fear of God to train him to the best of their ability for true citizenship in the kingdom of righteousness, would mark and objectify their inner experience and hallow it with a sense of the divine blessing.

From another point of view, such a ceremony would have meaning as an expression of a true social instinct. We have been discussing the ceremony from the parent's side. The congregation, however, is not a mere disinterested bystander, an "audience," but an active participant, no less in the ideal meaning of the ceremony than in the formality of it.

Society is interested in each newcomer. It is not only interested but morally involved in the new life. A child is not merely the offspring of its physical parents, it is the offspring of the social order. It is to take on the features of the social order in its own personal moral life. The all but universal custom of recognizing new-born children by a social ceremony of some sort testifies no less to the social instinct than to the parental. This social implication in each child's personality is conceived by primitive and non-Christian people, no doubt, in very crude terms. But among Christians, and in a time when the idealistic interpretation of society is the chief feature of our moral system, it is a pity that this unique occasion for the community to express its soul should be either allowed to pass wholly by or be so confused with the utterly different rite of baptism as to obscure its essential and beautiful meaning.

Society should be made to feel its responsibility for each new child that enters its communal life. The Motherhood of the Church as the spiritual organ of the social order, needs constant re-emphasis and illumination. It is a reality in religion second only to the fact of the Fatherhood of God.

Upon the church, therefore. should be impressed its glory and its burden in the young life brought to it by the child's parents. In a heartful ceremony it should extend its welcome to the stranger, acknowledge its obligation, jointly with the parents, for his moral and spiritual welfare, and give solemn pledges to provide him every opportunity possible to attain unto the highest Christian character.

Here is an opportunity for the church to render an inestimable service to the home, the nation and the Kingdom of God. Such a ceremony is thoroughly in accord with the spirit of our times which is impressing upon us the strategic importance of childhood in the development of personal character and social righteousness.

In modern Protestantism the rite of infant baptism has come to mean practically the parental dedication of the child to God and his welcome and recognition by the community through the church. It is more a dedication of the parents than an initiation of the child, more a commitment of the church to its spiritual responsibility than a conferment of status upon the child. The idea of baptismal regeneration is hardly traceable in the Protestant practice of infant baptism. And as was pointed out above, the mere baptismal rite is not deemed sufficient by itself to make infants full members of the church.

That this non-baptismal interpretation of infant baptism is the prevailing sentiment among the main pedo-baptist bodies of Protestantism is indicated in many ways. A singularly illuminating illustration is close at hand.

A Christmas lesson on the presentation of the child Jesus in the temple appeared in one of the texts of the Bethany Graded Lessons for the autumn quarter of 1910. In the absence from the country of the editor of the Bethany Lessons, C. C. Morrison, the proofs of this lesson were not examined and it was occasion of no little surprise to discover that the lesson frankly taught infant baptism.

In order to avoid the reappearance of this lesson, Mr. Morrison re-wrote it himself, omitting entirely the baptismal and christening interpretation and basing his treatment on the duty of parents to present their children to the Lord while they are still infants. The title was changed from "The Christening of a Child," to "The Dedication of a Child to God," and all baptismal references excluded.

Before authorizing this revision to be substituted in the Bethany Lessons for the lesson on infant baptism, it was submitted to the editors representing the other denominations in the Syndicate with the request that, if possible, it be adopted for their texts also. It was so adopted, and the lesson on infant baptism stricken out of the texts as used by Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational schools, besides other denominations represented in the Syndicate.

It is difficult to pass by an episode of this sort without remarking at length upon it as an illustration of the way in which Christians may attain unity if they really desire it. The editors had projected a coöperative plan of effecting Christian unity in the teaching of the new graded lessons. They determined to find common ground if possible, without sacrifice of conviction. The heartiness with which they accepted the suggestion of a possible common ground between baptist and paedo-baptist testifies to the sincerity and generousness of their purpose. If all our union projects were undertaken in the same temper the church would be farther on toward the goal of Christian unity.

But this excursus must not obscure our main point to which the illustration bears witness, namely, that infant baptism is coming more and more to be conceived in terms of parental dedication and congregational responsibility.

That the procedure may be unambiguous and that the moral value of the ceremony may not be lost, we submit that it should be entirely disentangled from the baptism rite and stand for just what it is: the solemn token by parents and society of their obligation to the child and their pledge by God's grace to discharge it.

Editorial Table Talk

An Illustration of Lay-leadership

An outstanding example of lay-leadership in Christian work is the case of William Jennings Bryan, whose significance among church men has of late years grown to be fully equal to his significance among men of state. Ever since his trip around the world Mr. Bryan has been presenting an illuminating interpretation of the missionary enterprise and sounding a clarion call to his brothers to support this great work.

The Y. M. C. A. of Canada has just been promoting him in a tour of that country, not in the interest of any political doctrine or policy, but of personal and social righteousness. Mr. Bryan has spoken in most of the great Canadian cities on The Prince of Peace, The Price of a Soul, and Missions. According to reports in the Canadian newspapers he won many votes for the great ideals he is known to advocate in these lectures. A writer in the Canadian Presbyterian says: "To have a man like Mr. Bryan let loose to go round the thinking world employing gifts so splendid as his are, is to have a force that makes for righteousness actively employed among those who are prone to believe that, after all, religion is intended for ministers, mothers and children. In Mr. Bryan the business men see Christianity applied."

And now Mr. Bryan is loaning himself to the Winona Assembly to aid in securing the half-million endowment fund with which to establish that institution on a solid basis. The significance of the Winona Assembly is increasingly apparent. It is a great place for earnest people to gather in the summer time to find inspiration and rest. The fact that a man of Mr. Bryan's standing has so unreservedly espoused Winona's cause indicates something of the grip which this great religious rallying center of the middle west is making on discriminating people. Dr. George Stuart of Tennessee and Dr. Solomon C. Dickey will accompany Mr. Bryan on a round of visits to the greater cities of the country and their trip is confidently expected to engage the aid needed by the institution.

Admiration for Mr. Bryan's Christian manhood is indicated in many ways by his Presbyterian brethren. One instance illustrating their attitude was evinced at the General Assembly last May when the whole body arose to its feet and cheered its fellow-member as he entered the session.

Keen Interest in London Preacher's Visit

The coming of Rev. Reginald J. Campbell to America five years after the New Theology tempest began to rage about his head in Britain is an event in which all church people of this land will take keen interest. Hardly less significant than the London preacher's message will be the attitude which American churches will adopt toward him. It is a bit prejudicial to Mr. Campbell's entree into orthodox circles that he should be "managed" by the son of Dr. A. S. Crapsey, the Rochester, N. Y., heretic who was deposed from the Episcopalian ministry. However, Dr. Crapsey, senior, is making it clear that it is his son and not himself who is connected with Mr. Campbell. We predict that Mr. Campbell will be cordially and even enthusiastically received everywhere. There has been noted in his preaching for the past year a marked reëmphasis of the evangelical elements of the gospel. As a matter of fact, Mr. Campbell never denied or discredited these evangelical realities, but in the stress of attack was driven to an emphasis of the social and ethical aspect of religion. In an interview reported in the Homiletic Review he states that he is now convinced that as a preacher he can do very little in working at the larger social problem, and that the strength and function of the pulpit lies in the direct appeal to the individual soul to live the Christian life.

The article by Rev. Leslie W. Morgan, our London correspondent, found on another page, tells the dramatic story of the reconciliation of the regular leaders of organized Christianity in England to Mr. Campbell. His reinstatement in recognized circles of orthodoxy in his own home will go far to disarm suspicion against him on this side of the water. But it now looks as if his own message in this country would render unlikely any opposition to him.

His first addresses brought surprise and reassurance to his hearers. Speaking before the Congregational ministers of New York City, on the drift of the masses away from the church, Mr. Campbell said:

"I think I may be permitted to say that one cause of this estrangement is the fact that the church still in such great degree couches her message in the dialect of the bygone age. Nevertheless, I confess I do not now emphasize this reason as much as I was inclined to do a few years back. I have to confess that the modernists and liberals in theology do not succeed in reaching the man in the street a whit better than the most conservative and orthodox. And I have come to believe that that failure of religious liberalism is due to its working far too much along an intellectual plane rather than along a spiritual plane.

"A second cause for the decline of the influence of the church is its slowness to sympathize with the aspirations of the masses for better conditions of living. The earnest contention of the workingmen for a larger share in the profits of industry is something more than the mere desire to eat, drink and be merry. It is deeper than that—the longing for a freer and larger life. Christ came to bring into the world more abundant life, and the masses want it. Christ has not lost the battle as long as the social ideal of 'each for all and all for each' survives. But what the church must do now is to fan that ideal into flame.

"But more than all else that hinders the progress of the church in these times is the habit of mind engendered by the all-absorbing nature of our material pursuits. Materialism as a philosophy is dead, but as a practical creed it is very much alive. And its effect everywhere is to produce the sort of man who is not favorable to religion. The great question which the church has to face today is whether the twentieth century man really wants the Bread that came down from heaven. Facing that question we must never cease to insist on the things of the spirit. From the highest platforms we can reach we must proclaim Christ and him crucified.

"Tomorrow will be a great day for our God and his Christ. So far from having done with Christ, the world is just beginning with him."

Intense Christian Interest in China

Christian people, Catholic and Protestant, in Europe and America, are keenly interested in the developments now going on in China. The orders, a dozen of them at least, and the great Propaganda of the Faith in the Catholic Church, and practically all Protestant societies have missionaries in China, and are sending thousands of dollars into that country annually. There is not a province which has not in it at least a few foreign missionaries, and very few societies in the whole world, doing foreign work, that are not represented there. The exceptions, if there are any, are some small ones in South Africa, which limit their work to Africa, and one or two in Australia, which do work in the South Sea Islands.

Fifty-six societies have medical missionaris in China, and forty-two including principal ones in England, Germany, Canada, and the United States, are engaged in educational work. Recently there has been talk of the foundation in Pekin of a great Christian university that shall form part of an oriental chain, the other three to be at Calcutta, Tokyo and Manila. Co-operation in medical, educational, and in most cases evangelistic work is now general between the Protestant societies.

Money going into China from Christian countries amounts to millions each year. For example, Congregationalists of the United States send there $150,000 through regular boards, and $100,000 more in special gifts. Baptists send nearly as much, while Methodists send $300,000 a year. The end of fifty years of effort there was celebrated by all societies at a great Shanghai conference last year, when an estimate of at least $50,000,000 of foreign missionary money was made as the amount sent in since Christian work began there. This was the Protestant figure alone. The Catholic contributions are unknown, but they have been large.

Christian Influence Not Measured by Numbers

While the number of Chinese Christians is small as yet compared with the vast native population, it is declared that the influence of the Christian population, because of better education, is out of all proportion to their numbers. In some provinces Christian day schools are being founded in vast numbers, and supported by private gifts sent from the United States. These are laying the foundation of a public school system. For the most part, and by agreement, European missionary societies have the fields in southern China, while American and Canadian societies have those of the northern part. This explains why American news is so much more largely that of Peking and Shanghai than of Canton and Hong Kong.

One missionary society, founded in England but having offices in Canada and the United States, and supported by Americans in generous measure, has eight hundred missionaries in and near Hankow and to the west of that city. It was established to go into untrodden fields. The odd thing about it, making it unlike every other society in the world, is that it does not guarantee salaries to its missionaries. It does not even guarantee living support. It never appeals for money, but relies for gifts wholly upon prayer. It promises its missionaries that it will pray for gifts, and will send them money for maintenance if God puts it into the hearts of anybody to send them money for that purpose. If no money comes the missionaries, even if away off in the heart of China, get nothing It is interesting to note that none have yet starved, and that many men and women are willing to go out on these terms.

Christian people, those in China and those out of it, have long looked for the events that now seem imminent. They believe their work is expressing itself in this form. They have not sought the downfall of the Manchu dynasty, but they have worked and prayed for the uplift of the people. The only unexpected thing about it all is the fact that it has come fifty years sooner than any one of them dared hope it might. At the moment, throughout Christian America and all the rest of the Christian world, almost every schedule of meetings, agreed upon in advance, has been dropped and prayers are being made for the success of a newer and better China, with as little bloodshed as possible. The millions of missionary money now going to China is likely to be doubled or trebled if events seem to prove the need.

One might easily affirm implicit belief in every one of these items, and yet possess absolutely none of the qualifications for citizenship in the kingdom of God. And it must be confessed that the most confident emphasis upon such features of the life of Jesus is still apparently consistent with qualities of temper and attitude utterly impossible in the life of one who possesses the spirit of Jesus.

It was not to doctrinal definitions and dogmatic affirmations that Jesus called men. He never asked any man to believe in a theory of his person or an episode of his life. Rather he insisted upon the qualities of character which he revealed in his own life—purity, self-denial, prayerfulness, humility, sympathy, love and faith. And only he who sees this fundamental characteristic of Jesus' gospel can save himself from the danger of holding a trivial and superficial conception of Christianity.

Is not righteousness, then, imputed to believers through the sacrifice of Christ, even as Paul affirmed? Yes, precisely as the parent imputes to the little child the full values of the grown man he is to be; as the farmer imputes to his field the virtue of the harvest yet to grow; or as the merchant imputes to his business the profits of the months that are yet ahead. But God never imputes to any man a virtue he does not possess, or is not at least on the way to attain.

Do Christians not have imparted to them the virtues of Jesus? Yes, but by no fiction of substitution. The character that was his becomes their own as the teacher confers his qualities on his pupils, the commander on his soldiers, the artisan on his assistants. The divine mystery of Christian life is too great for human explanation, and in a sense it is all supernatural, the gift of God to man. Yet it is no act of magic. It is the steady winning of character by the increasing possession of the qualities, enthusiasms and purposes of Jesus. How faith works by love in this holy transformation is beyond the vision of humanity to discern. But it is the ever-repeated miracle of salvation, and to it all who attempt the great adventure of the holy life set down the glory of their unfolding happiness.

It is time the church laid rightful emphasis upon the supreme truth that character is salvation and that it is the only salvation. It is time Christian people made an end of railing at morality as dangerous, and the moral man outside the pale of the church as the child of the devil in a darker sense than the man of notorious life. The doctrine of salvation by faith carried far when it gave sanction to such an outrageous and unchristian theory.

The church is recovering sanity on this theme. It welcomes in every man the virtues that made the life of Christ beautiful. But it has also the right to insist that only in the circle of that supreme life can these virtues ever become enthusiastic and aggressive. Double, therefore, is the obligation upon the good man to complete the value of his life by uniting it to the Master of whom it already speaks in part.

Only thus can the good life go on to perfection and experience find its coronation in the larger winning of character.

Interpretations

The Emotions of Autumn

How grandly quiet and beautiful and significant are these weeks of shortening days. The flowers in the woods and fields are gone; but nature loves coloring and therefore she paints the trees with her many hues. Her love of variety too is seen in the different shades with which she paints the trees of her forests and lawns. Gayest of them all is the Norway maple with its blood red shading into a deep yellow and it in turn with a lighter. How beautiful it looks in the distant, nor does it disappoint on nearer view. Every tree and leaf of the hard maple has variety of coloring and thus holds us with its mystic charm. The ash, unlike the maple, is uniform in its shade, which is usually a light yellow. The hickory, too, is uniform, but presents a much darker yellow than the ash. The oak has variety like the maple; but usually not so brilliant; though often its effect almost equals that of the Norway. All these and others seen on a near-by hill with sumac filling the foot-hill with a blaze of red present a picture to stir the soul to deep emotion.

It is the trees known in childhood that bring the deepest feelings. The memories of childhood intermingle with all the present scenes of nature. Emotions of maturity connect with emotions of childhood. It is our deep feelings that we remember.

> "To me the meanest flower that blows can give > Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears."

So much has come and gone since the first joy we received from the fiery red of the gorgeous maples! It is a thought akin to this that Burns had when he wrote:

> "Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon,
> How can ye bloom sae fresh and fair?
> How can ye chant, ye little birds,
> And I sae weary full of care?
> Thou'll break my heart, thou warbling bird,
> That wantons through the flowering thorn;
> Thou minds me o' departed joys,
> Departed—never to return."

Autumn reminds us of so much that has departed. I was in an orchard yesterday where many boxes of apples were being gathered. I smelled the fragrance of a heap of Rhode Island greenings. It was more than a quarter of a century since I had that experience—but what a flood of memory was opened by the scent of those apples. Again all my brothers and sisters were in the old orchard with father and mother picking the apples and putting them in barrels. But—ah! the train of thought is too deep for tears—and all caused by the fragrance of those apples I smelled yesterday.

I would not make the emotions of autumn too sad. It is the season of consummation, ingathering and reward.

The fields are filled with shocks of corn, pumpkins, and stacks of hay. It is a time of beautiful fulfillment. The land is full of the laughter of boys gathering nuts and of youth set free from toil. The hawk of the wild goose is heard far up in the sky returning to his southern home with his young raised in the North. The good farmer and his wife have slackened their haste and sit with each other longer by the fire-side. There are now only the chores to do as the field work draws to a close. The bank account of the countryman is swelled, and his children are sent to college and will become leaders in the cities of the next generation.

Thus all things happily move towards autumn. We give up in order that we may gain. While the mother regrets losing her baby she rejoices that her son is growing into manhood. Autumn is the fulness of life. Though we gain it by losses we are nevertheless glad to enter into consummations. Those in the autumn of life ought to have gained a poise and happiness unknown to youth.

> "Grow old along with me!
> The best is yet to be,
> The last of life, for which the first was made;
> Our times are in his hand
> Who saith, A whole I planned,
> Youth shows but half; trust God,
> See all, nor be afraid.

Better than spring is autumn. Life then is known, character is secure. The soul looks forth with a clear eye upon the harvest and thrusts in its sickle with a will and a song.

The Religion of Professor McGarvey

An Interpretation in the Light of the Disciples' History

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES.

EDITORS' NOTE:—In all the words of love which have been poured out upon the memory of Professor J. W. McGarvey, for forty years the most prominent teacher of the Bible among the Disciples, we have not yet found an utterance that attempts seriously to interpret him, to place him in the perspective of our brotherhood's history, and to estimate his teaching in the light of those ideas that are today controling the religious world. This task cannot be adequately done, we well know, in the hour that the hearts of his brethren are filled with tender personal emotions due to his passing from their midst. But it is a task that must be done. The following article by Dr. Ames was procured through a parishioner of his who heard with great delight a sermon by his pastor on the Religion of Professor McGarvey. At our request Dr. Ames has prepared this statement of the substance of his sermon. In a note he says he is not satisfied with it at all. "The critical seems to overbalance the sympathetic, while the reverse relation obtained in the sermon." Our readers, we are sure, will have no difficulty in discerning, as do we, the tender personal respect which underlies and suffuses the frank, critical utterance of the author.

In the death of Professor McGarvey the Disciples have lost a notably significant character. All tributes to his memory are freighted with deep personal affection, reflecting the genial warmth of a soul capable of the most genuine and enduring companionship. He had the grace and charm of the true southern gentleman. His unusually long service of teacher of young ministers at Lexington, Kentucky, gave him a remarkable opportunity to impress the life of the brotherhood. It is of importance, therefore, to rightly estimate his interpretation of religion, especially with reference to the historical development of the Disciples of Christ.

The Second Period.

He belonged to what may be called the second epoch of that development and in many respects he was its most representative man. This second epoch was the natural and logical outgrowth of the first period in which Thomas Campbell was the moving spirit and Alexander Campbell the organizer and advocate. The first epoch was vibrant with the plea for Christian Union. We are scarcely able now to appreciate what that aspiration involved a century ago. It sprang from the deep spirituality of Thomas Campbell. His "Declaration and Address" breathed the sincerity and the boldness of a great religious experiment. He did not formulate in detail the method and the manner of accomplishing his vision, but the vision itself was unmistakable in its urgency and authority. In that day of narrow creeds and unbelievable prejudice the dream of union, now so widespread, was the achievement of a genuine prophet. Alexander Campbell shared that vision, but in the effort toward its practical realization he formulated the problem which belonged to the second epoch and to which Professor McGarvey devoted himself.

Biblical Basis of Union.

That problem was the discovery and interpretation of the biblical basis of union. In following that interest, the study of the Bible became so prominent and absorbing as to occupy almost exclusive attention. The passion for union cooled perceptibly and came to be a rather doctrinaire and formal conception. Bible study was felt to be the chief task, the successful issue of which would naturally include so much and such kind of union as was involved in the divine plan. Without consciously or intentionally surrendering the ideal of union, the practical result was to withdraw emphasis from it and to magnify the textual study of the scriptures. Professor McGarvey was an adept in the text of the Bible. He is said to have known the New Testament by heart and his method of instruction made this memorizing of the text an essential of the minister's equipment.

New Testament Church Membership.

The immediate and pressing question of this second epoch was to establish beyond doubt the New Testament basis of church membership, for this basis was demanded by the creative impulse of the first epoch. It was natural, therefore, that Professor McGarvey's greatest work should be a commentary on the Acts of the Apostles, for this book treated of the beginnings of the church, the making of converts and their induction into its fellowship. This quest for authority of the scriptures also led to his extended discussion of Christian Evidence, the main point in which, for him, was the inspiration of the writers of the New Testament.

The Late Professor J. W. McGarvey.

An Outlived Point of View.

Although Professor McGarvey's work as a teacher has been done in the past fifty years, his point of view and the conception of his task were determined before that time. The notion of development as applied to history and nature began to be appreciated among scholars after the publication of Darwin's, "Origin of Species" in 1859. But at that date Professor McGarvey had been out of college and engaged in the ministry several years. President William R. Harper's life time was the period in which scientific, historical biblical study was established in America, but Professor McGarvey's views were formulated before Doctor Harper was born. Organized foreign missionary work marks the advent of the third epoch in the history of the Disciples, but that began less than forty years ago, when Professor McGarvey was forty-five years of age. While he was sympathetic with the missionary movement, he was able to relate it to a biblical text, and did not feel that it impelled the church to any radical reconstruction of its authority in terms of the living needs of men. The new social consciousness, which shares so many elements with the missionary ideal, is scarcely old enough to have appeared to him as related to religion at all.

The world-view, the doctrine of scripture, the conception of the church, of human nature, of God and of the future life which one finds in the writings of Professor McGarvey belong therefore, with the most perfect consistency, to that eighteenth century type of thought which was so dominant in the early environment of the Disciples.

Drama of Salvation.

In that type of biblical doctrine the drama of salvation was divinely arranged and transmitted into the world ready made. Professor McGarvey's volume of sermons is a most interesting illustration of this. After a chapter on inspiration he begins with sin and its punishment, treats of the terms of pardon, particularly faith, repentance and baptism, and then recounts various instances of conversion and admission to the church.

The abstract manner in which he sets to work is strikingly shown by his remarks upon sin and the nature of God. The horrible nature of sin is presented not in terms of the tears and anguish which it entails upon us mortals here and now, but he concludes that sin is a terrible thing because a gracious God has decreed an endless punishment of it. The common sense and good heart of Profesor McGarvey often hesitated at his logic, but the logic finally prevailed, in his official theology, at least.

Feelings Opposed to Dogma.

He says that if he himself had the power to prevent it, he "would not allow one single human being to ever shed a tear, or even feel a pang of the body or the heart." "But what," he asks, "does all that prove in regard to God? It only proves that I would act differently from the way that God acts. It does not prove that God acts improperly or inconsistently. It only proves beyond all question of doubt that a human being invested with infinite power and wisdom, would manage this world very differently from the way God manages it."

This virtual agnosticism, which declines to apply our highest moral standards to the acts of God, may be accompanied by a very humble and abject type of religious faith, but it often leads to an indignant rejection of all religious beliefs. There are many other respects in which Professor McGarvey's religion is so biblical, according to the eighteenth century point of view, that it becomes quite abstract and unreal when compared with actual life as we mortals know it. Not only is God distinctly different from a "human being invested with infinite power and wisdom;" and not only is the heinousness of sin unrealized in our experience but only inferred from the endless punishment of the sinner in a lake of fire; but the process of forgiveness and the assurance of pardon are not directly experienced. They are accepted on the testimony of scripture.

Conception of Sin.

He cites as an example of our inability to get rid of sin by any process we can understand, the case of a thief who, under good in-

Canada and the United States

A Critical and Patriotic Analysis of Canada's Recent Political Revolution

BY JOHN L. GORDON.

EDITORS' NOTE:—Every citizen of the United States is keenly interested these days in knowing the temper, the state of mind, of our neighbor on the north. Just what motives lie back of the overwhelming defeat of Reciprocity between the two countries is a matter not only of curiosity but of vital concern. The following article deals, therefore, with subject-matter for which our appetites are already whetted. But in addition to the subject-matter the graphic, eloquent, but withal critical, manner in which the task has been done by Dr. Gordon will not only interest and convince the mind but stir the blood of every reader. Dr. Gordon is pastor of the First Congregational Church of Winnipeg. It is a pleasure to be able to present to our readers his article at once so thrilling and so authoritative.

History is a drama which never ends, and Canada has been making history. We have had a discussion concerning international relationships and the question of reciprocity has brought Canada to the front as never before. Canada, more and more, is coming into the lime light. The seven millions of people who call themselves Canadians are just now receiving more thoughtful attention and international consideration than the seventy millions to be found in the twenty-one republics of South America.

Canada contains one-third of the area of the British Empire. Her thirteen thousand miles of coast line equals half the circumference of the earth. A million square miles of unexplored territory lies slumbering beneath the snows, northward. Canada is almost as large as Europe, thirty times as large as the British Isles, eighteen times as large as Germany, seventeen times as large as France, thirty-three times as large as Italy and twice as large as British India. Twenty-four Switzerlands could be laid out within her one province of British Columbia and not exhaust the territorial possibilities of the Canadian Alps.

Vast Resources.

Canada is well night inexhaustible in her natural resources. Here mineral treasures lie hid less than one hundred fathoms deep. Gold, silver, iron and every precious thing. Canada is the largest unprospected mining district in the world. Her deposits of nickel corundum and asbestos are the richest in the world. Her coal beds extend from Manitoba boundary to the Peace River. We have the official assurance that in one single coal deposit in Northern Alberta there are at least 66,000,000 long tons of coal. Here in the granite vaults of nature lie hid wealth untold and riches beyond human calculation. Food enough to feed a world! Wealth sufficient to build an Empire!

A Thousand a Day.

Her population is increasing at the rate of one thousand a day. During the past ten years a million immigrants from Great Britain and more than half a million American citizens have found homes of comfort and fields of labor within her boundaries. Last year seventy thousand people left Scotland for this land of hope and prosperity. And still they come, a thousand a day, the purest stream of immigration which ever enriched the soil of a new world—bringing traditions of the motherland and memories of the homeland—speaking the language of William Shakespeare and John Milton and held together by the invisible ties of race, religion and literature.

Political Revolution.

We turn our eyes from a consideration of the material splendors which crown our Dominion with the garland of prophecy to a review of the recent political revolution which has come as a surprise, even to the most sanguine opponent of the government which was fortunate enough to hold the reins of political power for a decade and a half.

Four reasons, it seems to me, are sufficient to account for the remarkable change in the political sentiments of the people, resulting in the most pronounced "land slide" ever known in the history of our people. I prefer, for the sake of simplicity and directness, to congest these four reasons in four words, much in evidence, in our recent campaign, namely, protection, prosperity, protestantism and patriotism.

Protection.

1. Protection, as an economic and political prinicple, was urged the most by the people who profit the most by it. Canadian capitalists and American capitalists alike stood firm for that artificial wall called "Protection." Canadian manufacturers feared lest their well-guarded interests should be disturbed by a sentimental wave of Anglo Saxon unity. And the working man, as a class, voted with the capitalist and manufacturer. He always does. When did you ever know working men as a class to vote in their own interests, except under the most tremendous pressure? A false issue seems to attract their attention and a bogie delights them as a toy kindles the imagination of a child; and the practical politician is not ignorant of the emotional and sentimental tenderness and tendencies of his fellowmen.

Prosperity.

2. "Prosperity" was a potential piece of philosophy which influenced the practical man. Why introduce a change when everybody is doing well? Why adopt a new plan of battle when everybody is winning? Why seek for readjustment when saving accounts prove the prosperity of the average Canadian, over and above his enterprising neighbor to the south? "Let well enough alone" was an argument cheap in the realm of high commercial ideas, but of subtle and indefinable force in the realm of practical politics. There is a close relationship between crops and votes, between the ballot box and the bank account, between a commercial prosperity and a political majority. When times are good people always vote to "let well enough alone." When times are bad, and then alone, is the demand for a readjustment imperative. Disraeli once remarked: "No administration can stand four bad crops." The people feared lest the government might be planning for a bad crop.

Protestantism.

3. Protestantism played not an unimportant part in our recent political upheaval. In that hour the sceptre of political power passed westward, from Roman Catholic Quebec to Protestant Ontario. The "Ne Te Mere" decree had caused a whirlwind of religious discussion which put new life into Protestantism. The reckless utterances of Father Vaughan had given every Protestant clergyman an opportunity to speak his mind. The Orangeman found himself once again in the field and "the battle of the Boyne" became once again a fiery figure of speech. Thousands of Canadians had been silently fostering the conviction that a Protestant Dominion ought to have a Protestant premier. Poor Laurier, noble, but forsaken; doubted by Roman Catholics and watched by Protestants, was unable to please one or satisfy the other. But Laurier is not to be pitied. He has written his name large on the scroll of Canadian history. In the future he will be spoken of as orator, statesman, diplomat and patriot. Canada has not produced a more honorable, upright, and sincere son of the Empire and friend of the king.

Patriotism.

4. Patriotism in this connection is the largest word of the four. The patriotic sentiments of the people of the Dominion had received a distinct shock. It was not that they feared annexation, but rather that any hint or indirect suggestion of such a thing was regarded by them as reflection upon their loyalty to the Empire. There was a universal feeling that Champ Clark's eloquent but foolish utterance called for an answer. Listen to the words:—"the American flag, flying over the whole of British North America, right up to the North pole."

Dangerous Joke.

It is a dangerous thing to joke about a strong man's flag. The flag of the British Empire—the flag with the cross on it—has been consecrated with the bullets' blast and smoke of conflict on a thousand fields of battle. Into the fabric of that flag has been woven the progressive events of fifteen of the best centuries of the world's history. And that's the flag that floats over British North America. No man may joke about that flag. Certainly not an American. There are certain historical incidents and accidents which ought to suggest to the mind of a cultured American orator the unwisdom of unfurling his flag where an older and more weather beaten piece of dry goods meets all the requirements of fate and destiny. The Britisher is proud of his flag. It is the master sign for continents and the sovereign of the sea. Through this old battle-torn ensign, humanity has seen a light, and in its ample folds there slumber the memories of ten thousand heroic achievements.

'Tis but an old piece of bunting,
'Tis but a colored rag,
But thousands have fought for its honor,
And shed their best blood for the flag.

Canada a Nation.

This political revolution marks a new chapter in the history of the Dominion. Canada has reached her majority. The land of the Maple Leaf has come of age. Without conference or consultation with the motherland, and in defiance of every commercial advantage offered to her, this young and rising nation of the north, settled for herself the question of reciprocal relationships in commercial affairs as between herself and her nearest neighbor. Henceforth Canada is no longer a colony or simply a confederation of provinces. Canada has become a nation. This revolution spells out Canada's declaration of independence in the Empire and independence as a unit among the nations of the earth.

Canada will not only retain its relationship to "the Islands of the Northern Sea," but Canada will be the most influential unit in that great sisterhood of states known as the British Empire. If we may quote the words of Sir Robertson Nicoll:—"Canada has before her the high destiny of the chief place in the British federation."

Old London.

And the official and political center of that federation, for a thousand years to come, will be a spot known to the British mind as "dear old London." One might imagine, from the florid eloquence of certain Canadian orators of sanguine temperament, that Buckingham Palace, London Tower, St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey, were to be lifted entire from the soil of their native heath and planted bodily within the precincts of that modern political capital, known as Ottawa. But destiny has not so determined. With the conquest of the air, there dawns the fulfillment of the vision of the prophet of Patmos, when with apocalyptic foresight he exclaimed: "There shall be no more sea." Even when Canada shall be able to boast of a population of one hundred million, London and Washington will still continue to commune together diplomatically.

Marks Cleavage.

A more important consideration confronts us, namely, the political revolution seems to mark a certain cleavage between the Dominion of Canada and the United States. Have the Canadian and the American been growing apart rather than coming together?

I confess I was somewhat startled when I read in the columns of the British Weekly these words: "There slumbers in the mind of every Canadian a suspicion of the motives and methods of his neighbor to the south." In an instant, there arose the question in my mind, "why should the Canadian look with doubtful mind upon his southern neighbor?"—Is it because of jingoism in the conduct of political campaigns? Is it because of the purchase and control of daily newspapers by great political parties? Is it because of the criminal purchase and transfer of votes in every political crisis? Is it because of the clouding of great issues in the hour when human need cries out: "Let there be light?" Is it because of the political protection of soulless trusts and combines? Is it because of a wild stampede for wealth and a universal spirit of mammon worship? Is it because of the increasing influence of the saloon and the gradual enthronement of the brothel? I answer—Hardly—for these are fast, all too fast, becoming Canadian characteristics. Well may the Canadian, and his American cousin ponder the words of Matthew Arnold:—"Down they come, those ancient nations, down they come, one after another, and all for the lack of righteousness."

Why?

I press my point of interrogation. Why should the Canadian deal so cautiously with his fellow Anglo Saxon who resides beneath the Stars and Stripes? Is it because yonder young republic is unlearned in the school of international courtesy? Is it because the sins of the Republic are daily laid before us by an enterprising press, as for instance, divorce and remarriage in high life; Sabbath desecration and empty churches; the worship of wealth and the deification of success; the vulgar attempt to establish an old world aristocracy in a new world democracy; the lynching of untried and unconvicted individuals by angry crowds and irresponsible mobs; the sudden enthronement and dethronement of certain popular heroes, worshipped for an hour and forgotten in a day; are these the objectionable traits which have called for an unfavorable verdict in the matter of a closer international relationship in the affairs of the new world? Possibly.

Not The Explanation.

But I make bold to brush all these aside, for nations closely allied geographically have always assumed a critical attitude toward each other. Witness Jew and Samaritan, Rome and Carthage, England and France, France and Germany—and even the separate nations which comprise the original and constituent elements of the British Empire.

As a native born American, though now a British subject by adoption, I am prone to resent, a method of daily news production, which spreads before the entire population every accident and incident, crime and blunder, disaster and catastrophe, which may tend to lower a noble people in the estimation of the world; while heroic deeds, high endeavours, enterprising effort and worthy achievement, expressed in daily deeds and continual conquests, both moral and spiritual, find sparse reference and small notice. Almost any nation might suffer by such a tactful species of scientific misrepresentation.

His Own.

If I had lost my love for yonder Republic I should blush to confess it. To every child born beneath "the Stars and Stripes" the name "American" is musical with ten thousand tender memories. America! Land of the free born, where flowers bloom in early spring and winter lingers not. Land of singing birds and sun-kissed valleys. Land of inland seas and towering mountains!—What a sisterhood of states! What a reunion of races!—What hopes possess thee! What dangers throng thy path! What dreams inspire thy progress. Across thy broad belt, from the rock bound coast where the pilgrim fathers trod, to the Golden Gate where the inrushing waters of the Sea of Destiny breathe an atmosphere of prophecy—across this broad land there moves the procession of the nations. O Land of boundless possibilities!

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said
This is my own, my native land."

Two Nations.

I state the fundamental thought and purpose of this article, when I affirm that destiny has determined, that there shall be two separate nations on this continent. There are two distinct national temperaments on the continent of North America. The American does not know the quality of a Britisher's patriotism, nor does the Canadian comprehend the problems of American life. The American does not comprehend the intensity of the Canadian's loyalty to the British Crown and the British flag. If he did he would hesitate to speak of "the parting of the ways," and refrain from all allusions to the possibility of the American flag floating over "British North America." Nor does the Canadian understand, comprehend, or grasp the colossal problems wrapped up in the fearful conflict between the Anglo-Saxon race and the diversified races of the old world. When foreign peoples begin to invade Canada in such numbers as to imperil the Christian institutions of our civilization, then and then only will the Canadian begin to understand and sympathize with his American neighbor. Woe betide both Dominion and Republic if the "foreign element," so called begins to join hands across the border before native born Canadians and thoroughbred Americans discover the things of fundamental worth and eternal importance concerning which there can be no diversity of opinion among enlightened men. A true Canadian and a genuine American are as much alike, in their personal ideals and Christian principles, as the two sides of a brick wall.

Separated But United.

But people residing on the same continent, without an intervening mountain or sea, and having the same language, religion, literature and institutions can not be kept apart. We are separated by history and government, but we are united by elements even more vital. You may build a tariff wall as broad as a province and as high as the highest peak of the Rocky Mountains, but nothing can prevent the Anglo-Saxon race from being a moral unit and a great directing influence among the nations of the earth. Love, commerce and common sense, will, in the end, break down any artificial wall which you can put up. I am not a Conservative. I am not a Liberal. Were I in the United States I would not be a Democrat or a Republican. I am first, last and always, an Anglo-saxonist. I believe that the world should be directed and dominated by the best race which time has ever produced. That race will fulfil the prophecy of Cecil Rhodes: "An alliance and a league of all English speaking peoples." The Anglo Saxon race will rule the world; and its theatre of action, for the next five hundred years, will be the continent of North America.

Looking For a Race.

God is looking for a race; a race which shall lead the nations of the earth. That race must have a world-religion, a world language, a world-policy and a world program. There are world problems which must be solved. There is coming on the scene of action a new race, an imperial race; in the physiognomy of which the features of every great nation will be reflected.

These things shall be! A loftier race
Than ere the world hath known shall rise
With flame of freedom in their souls
And light of knowledge in their eyes.
New arts shall bloom of loftier mould
And mightier music thrill the skies;
And every life shall be a song,
And all the earth a paradise!

Great Population.

When the population of Canada is 150,000,000 and the Population of the United States is 350,000,000, (which will probably occur in less than two hundred years) then the Ango-Saxon race will dictate the political policy of the world. A democracy built on a perfect system of education and crowned with the garland of spiritual power will solicit and secure the friendships of the world. Then will be ushered in an era of universal currency, universal transportation, universal communication, universal enlightenment, and universal legislation; thus securing for the world, a new era of broad knowledge, political peace, international harmony and an increased material prosperity for every part of the planet; thus making possible a sisterhood of all nations and the enthronement of the spirit of brotherhood. I believe that this achievement has been placed by destiny within the reach of the Anglo Saxon race and that the children of Britain and America will not fail of the opportunity.

"One race of ancient fame,
One tongue, one faith we claim,
One God, whose glorious name
We love and praise."

She was an old lady, who had once kept a very vigilant conscience for herself; but after making her life unhappy with it for some threescore years, she now applied it entirely to the exasperation and condemnation of others.—W. D. Howells.

R. J. Campbell Reconciled with Orthodoxy

England's Noted Liberal Modifies His Own Attitude and That of His Opponents

BY LESLIE W. MORGAN.

I am almost afraid to recall, even if I could, how long it has been since I have contributed any items to The Christian Century. My silence has not been due to the lack of anything to write about, for what with strikes, lock-outs, wars, and rumors of wars, the putting down of the House of Lords, the progress of the great insurance scheme, to say nothing of the annual conference of our churches at Gloucester, there has been news enough and to spare, but unfortunately time has been lacking.

Now the autumnal meetings of the various churches are in session, or have just been held, and I find it impossible to refrain from writing concerning at least one of these.

The readers of The Christian Century will be interested in hearing of what is called the "reconciliation" which took place last week at Nottingham in the course of the Congregational Union meetings. They will be the more interested in view of the visit which the Rev. R. J. Campbell is paying to the United States, having left Liverpool yesterday for that purpose. The Congregational church, and indeed all of the Free Churches, have been passing through somewhat of a nightmare during the past five years. Relief has come, and it has come in the usual way, namely, from an awakening which has brought the realization that the horrible experience was, after all, in the nature of a nightmare. The great stir over the New Theology of five years ago will be readily recalled, and since that time there has been a growing estrangement between Mr. Campbell and a great section of the religious world.

Object of Bitter Denunciation.

Many have denounced him generally, and on many hands he has been declared to be one of the chief causes for the decline in church membership, and the indifference to things religious. Needless to say his friends have contended that had it not been for his broad minded conceptions, and the liberalizing influence of the pulpit of the City Temple, things would be worse than they are. All would probably admit that through it all, Mr. Campbell has proved himself wonderfully able to make religion an immensely attractive thing to the "outsider." Perhaps it may be true that he makes it attractive without making it necessarily vital. But as to the "reconciliation." Mr. Campbell has not attended the Congregational Union meetings for several years, with the exception of last year when he was present at a special session to receive the reply of the Union as to whether they desired him to resign. The reply was somewhat indefinite, but was of such a character as to cause him to retain his membership. This year, while the committee did not definitely invite his presence, they agreed to the suggestion that Sir J. Compton Rickett should give to him a personal invitation to be present as his guest, and opportunity was given for participation in the discussions. It was at one of these sessions that the "reconciliation" took place.

Forsyth and Campbell.

A paper on the historical Jesus was under discussion and in the course of his remarks Mr. Campbell used these sentences: "Jesus Christ is the central factor in my spiritual life. I worship Him. He is the center of my life. I trust my sinful soul to Him for ever." Dr. Forsyth followed. Now Doctor Forsyth has been Mr. Campbell's most strenuous critic. A dramatic scene followed. "You are all aware that, as between Paul and

Rev. Reginald J. Campbell.

Barnabas, so between Mr. Campbell and myself and others, there has been, in scriptural language, sharp contention. I desire to say that it is at an end." A thrill went through the audience, and it was felt that history was being made. Doctor Forsyth continuing said, "As far as the principle of that contention is concerned that is at an end. Mr. Campbell does not believe exactly as I do. I do not believe exactly as Mr. Campbell does, but I trust that both he and you will allow me to say this, that when I heard him using two sentences—'I worship the Lord Jesus Christ' and 'I trust my sinful soul to Him for ever,' I felt that no man could speak like that without the Spirit of God. Nay, I will not be content with anything so vague, without the Holy Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself." Doctor Forsyth went on to say that he perhaps should have realized before that Mr. Campbell had had and cherished this vital personal experience, but at any rate, he (Doctor Forsyth), now saw it and was willing to admit it.

Liberal League's Meetings.

Following upon the meetings at Nottingham, the Liberal Christian League, held its autumnal assembly in London. This league was founded by Mr. Campbell three years ago for the purpose of not simply propagating his liberal theological ideas, but to render social service in the name of the Christian religion. This league itself has undergone something of an evolution in its short history. About a year ago there was a slight alteration in its name, and a very striking alteration in its purposes, or at any rate, in its emphasis. It was made clear at that time that it was intended to be a liberal Christian league, and that it did not hope to succeed without the emphasis on this, and without the recognition of the spiritual element that should enter into all service. This lead to the loss of certain extraneous elements that had become attached to the movement. The Assembly, which had just closed, gave opportunity for Mr. Campbell's old friends, and some new ones, to congratulate him upon the healing of the breach. Mr. Campbell stated that there was still cause to continue the organization. It had not come into existence to antagonize the churches, and the main object of the league still remained, to endeavor to reach the unchurched masses of the population. Their vocation was to reach the large section of people who are out of touch with organized religion. "We are trying," said Mr. Campbell, "what a liberal evangel can do." He had previously admitted, however, at the Congregational Union meetings, when discussing the matter of slackness in church attendance, and the slump in church membership, that a liberal theology had not proved itself more successful in reaching the people than the strictly orthodox. He probably would agree, however, that it was successful in reaching a different class.

Dr. Horton's Generous Testimony.

Dr. R. F. Horton attended the London meetings. Mr. Campbell introduced him as the best ministerial friend he had ever had, and declared he had never failed him in whatever adversity. Dr. Horton paid a striking tribute to Mr. Campbell's ability to reach the unchurched masses. Dr. Horton declared that Mr. Campbell had done for England, and for humanity, what he had been trying to do in his own small way in his own church, namely, to so interpret the evangel as to make it meet the needs of the modern man. For, he declared, the Gospel is still able to meet these needs if but the right interpretation is put upon it. He further declared that he would be the happiest man in England if he had been able to gather together such a meeting, and organize such a league as theirs, by his influence and teaching. The statement was as striking a tribute to the modesty of Doctor Horton himself, as it was to the ability of Mr. Campbell. Dr. Horton's address was a revelation to many in its outspoken socialism. Many other things he said: "Poverty is nothing like so great an evil as is excessive wealth. The real danger of our time is the degeneracy of people with accumulated and inherited wealth. The salvation of the rich depends on their earning their wealth without injuring others, and in their spending it for the good of others." He urged the league to prosecute the campaign for the conversion of the rich.

Dr. Clifford Never Estranged.

Dr. John Clifford spoke in another session and said that he was not there to become reconciled to Mr. Campbell for he had never been estranged. He had been in touch with him all these years, and had never refused to speak for him, or from his pulpit, and Mr. Campbell had also always been welcome to Westbourne Park. The day on which he spoke was his seventy-fifth birthday, and Mr. Campbell referred to him as "the boy who would not grow up."

Time will tell how much this reconciliation means, and how permanent it will be. Doubtless some will try to again stir up the waters, and they may even succeed, but the principle of the liberty of the individual cannot be robbed of its victory, and there are many who do not agree with either Mr. Campbell on the one hand, or with Doctor Forsyth and his followers on the other, who rejoice at this.

In this day of toleration there is one thing that cannot be tolerated, namely, intolerance.

The Postoffice Department at Washington, announces that it will not act as Santa Claus this year. Letters addressed "To Santa Claus," and forwarded to the dead letter office will not be distributed to charitable organizations, benevolent persons, poor children or others. Four years ago postmasters were authorized to turn over such letters to charitable persons, but because of many abuses, the order has never been renewed. Under the laws and regulations, letters to Santa Claus are classed as "fictitious," and returned to the writers or destroyed.

Our Readers' Opinions

Dr. Sweeney's Questions

On this page we published last week a portion of a communication by Gen. Z. T. Sweeney of Columbus, Ind. Closing the first half of his article with this sentence, "Now there are a few statements of yours to which I will call atention," Dr. Sweeney continues as follows:

First: "This paper will be found right at the front with General Sweeney and all other true disciples, opposing any one who proposes to tamper in any way with the New Testament form of solemnizing baptism." Well, General Sweeney and all true disciples are at the front opposing those who would tamper with the New Testament form of baptism by substituting a human substitute in its place. Can you stand with us in this refusal and plead at the same time with us to accept this substitute as valid baptism? Verily, "the legs of the lame are not equal." [The Christian Century still stands with General Sweeney against tampering with the New Testament form of solemnizing baptism. We do not plead that any "substitute" be accepted as valid. We plead that only valid baptism be accepted as valid.—EDITORS.]

Second: You are proposing to accept the affusion of the Methodists, Presbyterians and Congregationalists as valid baptism, [This paper is not proposing to accept affusion as valid baptism. Our position on this point was made so emphatic in previous correspondence with Dr. Sweeney that we are surprised he should ignore it here.—The EDITORS] when three-fourths of them have never been baptized acing to your own definition of baptism. Their baptism did not contain a single one of the elements you say baptism must contain in order to be Christian baptism. In their baptism, they did not consecrate themselves to Jesus Christ. They were baptized before they knew anything about Christ or consecration, before they knew their right hand from their left. Neither were they initiated into the church unless you admit infant baptism and infant church membership. I don't think you are ready for that yet, but you are on the road and will soon reach it if you will accept the conclusions logically demanded by your premises. In conclusion I wish you to answer the following questions, letting the numbers of the answers and questions correspond with each other.

(1.) Does the commission given by Jesus Christ contain the terms upon which men are admitted into the Church of Christ?

(2.) If not, where are the terms to be found?

(3.) Have you any authority to say that a man who has not complied with the terms commanded by Jesus Christ and practiced by the apostles, is a Christian? If so, give it.

(4.) Did any apostles ever promise salvation on other terms?

(5.) Have you any divine authority for saying God will accept a human substitute for one of his divine requirements?

(6.) Do you believe infant baptism is valid in the light of your own definition, viz: Baptism, to be Christian, is an act in which the candidate consecrates himself to Christ, and by which he is initiated into his Church?

(7.) If infant baptism is not valid when it is performed by that sort of spiritual hocus pocus can it be "validated" forty years after it has been performed?

(8.) If infant baptism will not initiate into the Church of Christ, and you say there is no membership in the church without baptism, will you rule out from church membership all who were baptized in infancy?

(9.) If you do not rule them out please explain how you got them in without baptism?

There are a number of other interesting things that will develop out of the incontrovertible propositions we have agreed upon which we must leave for a later letter.

Sincerely and fraternally,

Z. T. SWEENEY.

Reply to Dr. Sweeney

1. Yes, in a highly generalized form. The two commissions as recorded in Mark's and Matthew's gospels deal with the "terms" of salvation abstractly. Just what is the concrete content of such words as "gospel," "believeth," "teach," "all things whatsoever I have commanded you," "baptizing," etc., must be determined by referring to the whole body of Jesus' teaching as well as to his life. If we possessed nothing but these commissions we would be entirely ignorant of the way of life.

2. Besides the commissions, the terms are found in many other portions of the New Testament, and often more clearly, concretely and completely than in the commissions.

3. None whatever.

4. No.

5. None whatever.

6. The Christian Century believes that infant baptism is valid in those cases where the subject of it, having grown to an accountable age does actually himself assume the spiritual relations and practical duties of church membership.

Without such personal assumption of relations and duties the act of sprinkling water upon the child is utterly without meaning—just as meaningless as the immersion of an adult would be who did not personally assume these duties and relations.

On the human side, every baptism must be "validated" by the subject of it—whether adult or infant. Its validity does not inhere in a physical act but in the spiritual purpose of both church and initiate, of which purpose the physical act is a sign and symbol. The physical act is not baptism. Immersion is not baptism. The immersion of an adult is not baptism. The immersion of an adult has nothing whatever to do with baptism unless the adult does, as a matter of fact, assume the relations and duties of a member of Christ's body. For this is what baptism is: the actual self-consecration of an individual to Christ and his induction into the Church of Christ.

We are unwilling to say that the pious exercise of sprinkling water upon an undiscerning infant's head is baptism unless he does, as a matter of fact, assume the relations and duties of a member of Christ's body. When we see such an one actually inside the Church of Christ, assuming for himself the responsibilitites and relationships which his parents and the church by faith pledged him to, we have no choice save to acknowledge that he has been baptized, howsoever irregular we must conceive his baptism to be. He must have been baptized because he is already in.

In this point of view the stricture in the paragraph marked Second above, does not apply. The only infant baptism which we recognize as valid—or possessing any meaning whatever to the subject of it—does include both elements of our definition: self-consecration and induction. Nor does this estimate of infant baptism involve in any sense the question of infant church membership. Our Lord himself provided for all "such" the highest place in the membership of his Kingdom without any baptism whatever.

7. There is no more "hocus pocus" in infant baptism than in adult baptism—if infant baptism is taken in such terms as to include the same personal moral choice of the subject to complete it that adult baptism requires.

8. The validity of infant baptism in this sense is beyond dispute. A large portion of the unquestionable membership of the Church of Christ is made up of those who have received no other baptism. The Disciples of Christ have always regarded them as Christians, members of the church of Christ, and Doctor Sweeney, no doubt, agrees with his brethren on this point.

9. Since he regards them as members of the Church of Christ and believes that they are so accepted by Christ and yet refuses to accept their baptism as valid will he please explain to the readers of The Christian Century how he "got them in without baptism."

In these replies to our brother's questions we have tried to be as direct and categorical as possible. But having said so much we deem it important for the general reader that we say more on this subject of infant baptism, in order to avoid misunderstanding and to give a fair expression of our views. Our further remarks will be found on page 6. They are not logically relevant to the questions and strictures presented in the above communication. Hence we disconnect them from our reply, hoping thus to keep strictly to the points Doctor Sweeney has raised as well as to avoid tempting him too far away from the question which our ninth reply above contains.—The EDITORS.

Angel Guards

I have seen a picture in the Uffizi Gallery, in Florence, representing the Battle of Irvy, in which Henry IV of Navarre is waging war. As I looked at the picture, the contending forces were in such mingled struggle that it was impossible to say, from the viewpoint of an onlooker, which side would be victorious. By-and-by I saw up in the right hand corner of the picture a company of angels with drawn swords; and that told the story that they who were guarded by the divine forces would win the day. When we often look out over the struggling sons of men, beholding how the forces of light are contending with the forces of dorkness, we may sometimes wonder which side will be victorious; but if we only have the eyes of faith, we will see many signs giving prophetic promise that the Lord's army will win, and that light will dispel darkness, and that Christ will surely conquer.—*C. The Moral Leaders of Israel

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XLVI. The Visions of Daniel (Daniel 7-12)

November 17. Text for Special Study, Dan. 7.

1. THE SERIES OF VISIONS.

The first part of the book of Daniel (chapters 1-6) preserves certain traditions regarding four heroic Hebrew youths who were exiles in Babylonia and became conspicuous figures at the court of Nebuchadnezzar the great king. The purpose of these stories, as already seen, was to emphasize in the minds of the wavering Jews of the Greek period the necessity of unwavering loyalty to the laws and customs of their nation. Persecution was rife. Antiochus Epiphanes, the king of Syria, was attempting to coerce his Jewish subjects into heathen beliefs and practices. Apostasy was already doing its deadly work. Many of the people had yielded to the seduction or the threats of heathenism. The elevation of the ancient standards of morality and loyalty was essential if Israel was not to lose totally its testimony.

The second portion of the book (chapters 7-12) is devoted entirely to a series of visions purporting to have been experienced and related by Daniel, the ancient sage, one of the heroes of the stories already referred to. In each of these visions a survey is given of the period from the Babylonian captivity in the sixth century B. C. to the times in which the author of the book is living, in the second pre-Christian century. In accordance with the common method of apocalyptic writings, the author puts the events of the past into the mouth of a distinguished and revered prophet of earlier time, thereby securing for the message the appearance and sanction of prediction. The purpose of this device was not to record those past events themselves, but to secure their force and momentum for the purpose of making the actual prediction of coming deliverance in the immediate future. The author's sole desire was to stay the hearts of the fainting and perplexed Jews of his own time with the confident assurance that their troubles would soon be at an end. Of this fact he was sure; but his only means of convincing his fellow Jews of this hoped-for deliverance was to give it the appearance of being a part of a long and carefully planned series of events, all of which had been predicted by a great prophet of an earlier age. Since then so much of the content of this apparently prophetic message had already come true, that he hoped to be able to carry over his people into the period immediately before them by the sheer urgency and momentum of a series of events which were made to close with the brilliant successes of the holy people and the establishment of the final regime of happiness and peace in the Messianic age.

2. THE FOUR EMPIRES.

In each one of these visions, as in chapter 2 of the previous narratives, a survey is given of the history from the times of Nebuchadnezzar to the writer's own age. This survey is usually in terms of four great national experiences, the Babylonian, Median, Persian, and Greek. Earlier commentators, anxious to bring the message of the Book of Daniel to apply to Jesus' days and his Messianic career, made the fourth empire the Roman. But this is now seen to be entirely erroneous.

The writer of the book was telling the story as he understood it, not for its own sake but for the lesson he could draw from it for the encouragement of his people. In chapter 2 the four empires represented by the head, breasts, thighs and legs of the great image, were these same four nationalities, Babylonia, Median, Persian, and Greek. The fact that historians usually merge the Median and the Persian into one is not significant for the student of this book. We must take its author's interpretation of the facts which were to him at a long remove in the past.

In the seventh chapter these four empires are again brought to review in the guise of four beasts, the lion with eagle's wings, the bear with the three ribs in its mouth, the leopard with four wings, and the fourth beast with great iron teeth. In the eighth chapter the same history is repeated under the figure of the ram with two horns and the he goat. There it is specifically affirmed that the ram with the two horns represents the kings of Media and Persia, while the he goat is Alexander the Great, the king of Greece.

In chapter eleven a long and minute rehearsal is given of the relations between the kingdom of Syria on the north and that of Egypt on the south, representing the two great divisions into which the Greek empire fell at the death of Alexander. With considerable knowledge of the history of these events, a knowledge which grows in definiteness and accuracy as the writer approaches his own time, the story of the troubles which had involved Palestine, is recounted. And thus in every instance the events of these four centuries are utilized as the approach to the great deliverance which the apocalyptic writer, assuming the functions of prediction, insists in soon to be realized.

3. THE PERSECUTOR.

But all these predictions, which are in reality the recounting of past history, culminate at one specific point. In every instance the writer is concerned to designate the figure of the persecutor, Antiochus Epiphanes, who is the monster ravaging the fair fields of the holy people.

In chapter seven this point is reached in verse eight, where the "little horn" that arose among ten horns is described. The interpretation is continued at verse twenty-one, where this horn, representing the well known king of Syria, is spoken of as making war with the saints; and again in verse twenty-four, where he is described as speaking words against the Most High, wearing out the saints, and thinking to change custom and law. But his time is short, for only three years and a half, the usual apocalyptic symbol of a brief time, shall intervene before his fall.

In chapter eight this horn or king once more appears as the significant figure of the vision. In verse nine he grows strong, particularly toward the south and east and the holy land, describing the course of Antiochus in his campaign southward from Antioch, his capital. He was so arrogant as even to defy the host of heaven and trample the stars. He magnified himself against God, the prince of these heavenly hosts, took away the burnt offering and cast down a part of his sanctuary. Again in verse twenty-three he is described as a king of fierce countenance and understanding mysteries, who stands by the power of false gods, prospers and destroys mighty ones among the holy people. He is crafty, arrogant and presumptuous, but he shall be broken by apparently mysterious means within the same period of time, three years and a half or thereabout, described as two thousand three hundred evening-mornings.

Again in chapter nine, in which the author has tried to prove that the seventy years of Jeremiah's prediction are really seventy weeks of years, extending, therefore, down to his own time, he speaks of the people of the prince, that is of Antiochus, who shall come to destroy the city and the sanctuary; but affirms with confidence that his end shall be with a flood. In the meantime, for a half of the week, that is for three years and a half, he abolishes the sacrifice and sets up the little heathen altar in the very place of Hebrew sacrifice, "the abomination that makes desolate," (Matt. 24:15). Chapter eleven is more detailed in its description of Antiochus. After giving a summary of his predecessors and their wars with Egypt, our author makes a specific review of his career and campaign, verses twenty-one to thirty-nine. All that point, however, he breaks off the simple story of Antiochus' past career, and predicts his overthrow as soon at hand, but in terms which were never realized, although Antiochus soon after this time came to his tragic end.

4. THE KINGDOM OF THE SAINTS.

It is the view of our author that when the present disasters shall have ceased by the fall of Antiochus, the good era of blessing shall be ushered in at once. In 2:34 the "little stone cut out of the mountain without hands" strikes the image of the world empires upon its feet and grinds it to powder. And in verse forty-four this is interpreted to mean the setting up of the kingdom of God which shall remain forever. This of course refers to the Jewish hope of deliverance from their foes, and the setting up of their own independent government. In the visions this matter is made clear past all misunderstanding.

In chapter seven at the very time when the little horn is attempting to destroy the work of God, a judgment scene is introduced and the Eternal is seen upon the throne. Judgment is passed upon the four empires; their dominion is taken away, and one like unto a Son of Man comes with the clouds of heaven to receive the dominion of the world (verses 9-14). This is immediately interpreted as referring to the Jewish people, "the saints of the Most High" (verses 18, 22, 25, 27). Here, as it will be seen at a glance, the one who comes as the Son of Man in the clouds of the heaven is the personified figure of the holy people, the Jewish race, a connection which the author is at pains to affirm again and again.

Chapter twelve deals with the period of consummation just ahead, when there shall be severer trouble even than those in the past, and the holy people will require every element of courage to keep up their faith. But their deliverance is sure, and with this hope is linked the promise of a resurrection from the grave for those who have died in the faith. When the question arises as to how long must intervene before the end, the author insists, as he has done repeatedly in the past, that the time is brief, only three years and a half, "time, times and a half," and that one who lives beyond the period, (sometimes spoken of as forty-two months, sometimes as twelve hundred and sixty days) surviving to such a time as "thirteen hundred and thirty-five days," or any like number, will see the end of this troublous time, the overthrow of the desolator, the coming of the holy people to power, and the realization of Israel's dreams.

5. THE VALUE OF THE APOCALYPSE.

It has been seen that we are not to look to the Book of Daniel for either prediction or authentic history. It is an apocalypse, written for the purpose of preserving faith by representing national experience in terms of a divine scheme of events. Its value lay in its ability to carry a considerable number of the people across a difficult and dangerous section of Judah's life. That it was successful in accomplishing this purpose is perfectly clear from the almost immediate rise of the great Maccabean national movement, and because of the enduring place which the book secured in the regard of the Jewish and Christian communities.

To be sure the magical values which have been found in this book by Christian commentators, who have made it the record of history to the end of the world or the embodiment of Christian Messianic hopes, are entirely unfounded. The book contains no reference whatever to the coming of our Lord. It deals wholly with a local and critical Jewish situation. But so similar were many of the crises of the early church that Christians of those and later ages have found in it an unceasing comfort and assurance, without stopping to estimate with care the purpose of the original utterances.

Our Lord himself saw in its words descriptive of the defilement of the temple and the erection of the altar to Jupiter in the court of the sanctuary, a symbol of the approaching devastation of Jerusalem by the Romans in his own generation. And his use of the book shows how familiar it was to him and to the people in his time. It is not to be regarded with the superstitious reverence which fantastic exegesis has thrust upon it, nor on the other hand is it to be slighted as of no significance in the history of the Hebrew race. It had its purposes and its limitations. But its chief value was that of confirmation of the faith of Israel in a moment of peril. And perhaps there is to be added as an important part of its work the inspiration of a company of heroic leaders who presently arose to achieve for Judah the most remarkable experience through which the nation passed in the centuries following the exile.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES.

Topic for November 19: A Missionary Journey Around the World. XI. Missions in South America. Acts 19:13-30.

In this missionary journey around the world we spent three lessons studying the United States, but we are to have only one lesson on South America although "there are more square miles of inhabitable and tillable land in South America than in North America." That land will produce some kind of valuable crop from the Carribbean Sea to the Straits of Magellan. Brazil is larger than our United States not counting Alaska. This vast stretch of fertile land is not densely populated—only about 40,000,000. Brazil alone could support four times the population of the continent. With the congestion of the population in Europe, in the far eastern countries, and with the growing congestion in our own land the increase of population in South America is bound to be very great.

While the government of the people is that of republics in principle such as our own, the Roman Catholic Church has been the controlling power there politically as well as religiously. The Spanish language prevails except among the Indian populations. The present type of church there is mediaeval, superstitious, and intolerant. It is therefore inadequate to the needs of the moral life of the people of this day. From fifty to eighty per cent of the people in the various republics are illiterate. To these are the conditions.

What is being done in this fertile field? Very little. Robert E. Spear has pointed out in one of his addresses that a little group of North American capitalists sunk more money in one copper mine in one of the South American republics than all the protestant Christians of the world have ever invested in South America for her moral and spiritual redemption. This has been a neglected if not a forgotten land. For some reason missionary leaders have not had their attention sufficently called to this opportunity.

But missionaries have done some things though the number of their converts has been small. The missionaries going there have turned statesmen and laid foundations broad and deep for the superstructure of later years. They have gone into the legislature of eight of the South American republics and secured religious tolerance in seven of the republics and given liberty to conscience in matters pertaining to worship to more than sixty millions of the South American people. The number of converts to Protestant Christianity is in the neighborhood of 60,000 people. If we ask why no more than that can be found, the answer is that we get out in proportion as we put in. Our putting in has been small, and of course, our getting out will be small.

Christian Endeavorers, the rest of this land remains to be possessed. And it remains for us to possess it. These people are our neighbors. A land of republics—a fact which makes the field peculiarly accessible to us who live under a similar form of government. Let us rise to our opportunities.

Humboldt, Nebr., Dedication

On Sunday, October 30, the writer dedicated the beautiful new house of worship at Humboldt, Neb. Pastor Robertson has only been at Humboldt about a year, but in that time he has done a great work. The house of worship dedicated cost the congregation $7,000. The old house of worship was used in the construction of the new one. It is now modern in every sense. On the first floor it has a fine auditorium, pastor's study, choir room, and several class rooms, also a gallery. The basement is equipped with kitchen, dining room, reception room, class rooms, toilet, and a fine heating plant. The church is equipped for work of every kind. On dedication day $4,000 had to be raised. When the day was over more than the $4,000 was raised. Professor Bert Wilson, a former pastor, was present during the day. He served the church as pastor for six years. He is still much beloved. F. E. Day, of Verdun, was with us in the afternoon. The pastors of the other churches in the city were with us. The musical program for the day was exceptionally fine. A great dinner was served free to all that would remain. All were very happy. Mr. Robertson has greatly endeared himself to both church and community.

WILLIAM OESCHGER,
Chancellor Cotner University.

The Troubled Church

Suffering for righteousness' sake has never permanently hurt the church. Whenever men are unpopular because they are good, it is a sign that they are powerful in disturbing the wickedness around them. So far from minding criticism founded upon the high character of Christians which rebukes the low or the uncertain character of the community about them, we should find grounds of encouragement in it. "But even if ye should suffer for righteousness' sake, blessed are ye." Our Lord warned us that we were not only to be lights, but that our lightbearing would get us into trouble. Let the church be criticized because it sets high standards of thought and conduct, and that is the highest compliment it can receive from those who are made uneasy in living on a lower level. That is good trouble which testifies that the church is doing its work.—Isaac O. Rankin.

fluence, has been educated out of stealing. He is no longer committing theft but his old sins are still there. "If a man is educated out of his sins, they are there still written against him, and there is the eternal penalty still awaiting him." He denies any saving value in the example of Chirst even if men are influenced to follow him. The redemption comes about in some inscrutable manner through "the blood of Christ." In a similar way, one cannot directly experience pardon of sin. "Because God is up in heaven, and it is an act of his up there, and they can not know it by the way they feel." When one has made confessioin, repented and has been baptized, then he has the right to feel happy, not because he has directly experienced salvation, but because he has done those things upon the doing of which the Bible makes salvation dependent.

The Hero of a Vanishing View.

It is not necessary to cite further illustrations of this literal, formal conception of Christianity. It is not strange that Professor McGarvey felt himself to be the hero and champion of a type of religion which no longer finds supporters in the centers of learning and in the awakening social consciousness of our time. He was a man of the second period in the history of the Disciples, living far into the third epoch. He did not see the full meaning of the great missionary epoch. He did not relate its world-conquering virility to the new religion of the spirit which modern biblical scholarship has done so much to set free. It may be claimed also that the sense of reality and the experimental venturesomeness of twentieth century Christianity are expressions of the scientific, social progress of our time. Certain it is that these influences have given a new and far more practical enphasis to the ideal of Christian union. It is demanded now by conditions and opnortunities which confront Christianity throughout the world. Authority for it is found in the spirit of the gospel and in actual social needs, more than in any letter of scripture.

The Social Ideal

Religion is no longer conceived simply as affording a way of escape for sinners. It is a great positive social task for the elevation and spiritualization of all human life. It believes in a God who is humane, moral, and reasonable. It drafts every man for service here and now. It measures salvation by character. It glorifies the Christ whose word is love and whose life is service.

We cannot fail to admire the sincerity, the purity, the consistency of character and the prodigious labor of Professor McGarvey, but none of these things could justify us in withholding ourselves from the appeal which the present day makes upon us.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

G. E. Crist has begun a meeting at Herrin, with John R. Dickson.

Sullivan Church is having a revival meeting conducted by the pastor, J. W. Kilborn, assisted by Elmer E. Rice of Dixon.

Literberry Church is having the services of Rochester Irwin in a revival meeting. The pastor is C. G. Cantrall.

E. V. Spicer is conducting a revival meeting at Timewell, with thirteen additions during the first few days.

There were six additions in a short meeting at Hallsville, conducted by H. M. Barnett. The pastor is T. T. Holton.

There were twenty-one additions at last report from the meeting being held at Humboldt by Evangelists Hill and Knowles.

A revival meeting at Mt. Moriah, held by O. L. Hawkins and G. W. Foley, was concluded with twelve additions.

Robert A. Sickles, pastor of Illiopolis Church, is in a meeting at Mechanicsburg, assisted by Mr. Lobdill as chorister.

R. H. Robertson, who has been pastor at Shelbyville for five years, will sever his connection with that congregation December 31.

J. E. Moyer and J. T. Ward led the congregation at West Salem in a revival meeting with eleven additions resulting. The pastor is G. W. Ford.

The churches of Marion County are attempting to do co-operative work in becoming a living-link in the State Missionary Society.

Mrs. Lew D. Hill, wife of the evangelist, is preaching alternate Sundays at Dalton City, where Mr. Hill held a union meeting early in the fall.

Pekin meeting, where O. C. Bolman, the pastor, is doing the preaching, has resulted in thirty-nine additions at the end of fifteen days.

E. M. Norton held a short meeting of three weeks at Mt. Olivet Church near Gifford, which resulted in fifteen additions, all but one being on profession of faith.

E. A. Gilliland is leading his home congregation at Lincoln in a revival meeting, with the assistance of H. H. Caldwell as director of music.

Dahlgren Church had the leadership of J. E. Stout in a revival meeting which closed with thirteen additions, and a general reorganization of the church.

Guy B. Williamson, pastor of Waverly Church, is conducting the music in a meeting at Carlinville, where J. H. Porter, the pastor, is doing the preaching.

D. W. Conner and congregation at Palestine are co-operating in a union meeting held in a large tabernacle by evangelists Hamilton and Pearman.

Girard Church concluded a meeting which resulted in eleven additions. The pastor was assisted by Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Saxton as leaders of the music.

J. H. Wright assisted by F. R. McDonald, of Arthur, has just closed a good meeting at Harristown. There were five accessions. Mr. Wright speaks heartily of Mr. McDonald's work as a gospel singer.

E. M. Smith, pastor of First Church, Decatur, is being assisted in a revival meeting by M. W. Yocom, pastor of Taylorville Church. At last report there were twenty-one additions.

Robert A. Sickles, having concluded three years in an unusually successful pastorate at Illiopolis, was extended a unanimous call to continue in the pastorate for another three years.

A. W. Crabb's meeting at Harvel had resulted in twenty-nine additions up to last report, twenty-seven being on profession of faith. Congregations are taxing the capacity of the house nightly.

The new edifice at Nebo was dedicated by J. Fred Jones without any indebtedness. A. R. McQueen of Canton, Mo., is pastor. Mr. Jones is continuing in a short meeting for this church.

The revival meeting at Centralia, conducted by A. L. Huff, the pastor, assisted by E. C. Tuckerman and wife, is making fine progress. On Sunday, October 22, there were seventeen additions.

Centennial Church, Bloomington, of which Milo Atkinson is pastor, is looking forward with anticipations to a meeting which will be held in January by Herbert Yeuell, assisted by his singer.

The union meeting at Rushville, in which H. L. Maltman and his congregation are uniting, had resulted in 250 conversions at last report. The churches are being led by evangelists Beadles and Fischer.

F. L. Davis, pastor at Waynesville, is in New Salem, Ind., conducting a revival meeting for the church at that place. Mr. Davis has just concluded a meeting for his home church, in which there were thirty-five additions.

J. T. Davis, who is in the fifth year of his pastorate at St. Joseph, was assisted in a revival meeting by W. W. Sniff, pastor of Paris Church, in which there were twenty additions to the congregation and an unusual spiritual quickening of the entire church.

A revival meeting was held at Stronghurst by Evangelist C. O. McFarland and wife, of Kansas, in which there were fourteen additions. The meeting served to encourage the congregation to renewed activity. The church is pastorless, but will employ a minister at once.

Stanford Church held a revival meeting with twenty-eight additions, twenty being on profession of faith. A very large proportion of the additions were young men. The pastor, Norman H. Robertson, had the co-operation of F. M. Myrick and wife of Ohio. The work of the evangelist is highly commended.

A revival meeting was held at Lexington Church, where J. P. Givens is pastor, which resulted in seventeen additions and a larger loyalty to the church developed in the congregation. C. J. Robertson was the evangelist, and is commended by the pastor and church as an enthusiastic, earnest and tireless preacher of the Gospel.

Vawter and Marty are being met by large congregations every night in the meeting at Princeton, where Cecil C. Carpenter is minister. The additions number thirty, with the meeting continuing. A fine spirit pervades the various churches of the city, and the evangelists are having the co-operation of very many people outside the Christian church.

John R. Golden, of West Side Church, Springfield, is holding a revival meeting for H. H. Jenner and the Stuart Street Church of the same city. The opening services were auspicious, and with the evangelistic message and fervor of the evangelist, coupled with the earnest co-operation of the pastor and congregation, it is expected that a meeting of no small proportions will result.

The church edifice at Augusta was rededicated October 22, without indebtedness by Evangelist Sword, with his musical director, Mr. Kay in charge of the music. The amount of money raised was $5,000. L. A. Chapman, minister at Carmi, is holding a short meeting in the country. The evangelists are continuing with the pastor, E. T. Cornelius, in a revival meeting in which there were four additions by confession the first week.

O. W. Lawrence, pastor of Central Church, Decatur, preached his farewell sermon October 22, and left the following day for his new pastorate at North Yakima, Washington. Mr. Lawrence and his family leave the Decatur Church with the regret of the entire congregation. A minister has not yet been called to this church, but it is learned that several men are under consideration. C. C. Morrison, editor of The Christian Century, preached for Mr. Lawrence on a recent Sunday.

A. I. Zeller has been welcomed to his new pastorate at Petersburg, having begun his ministry there the first of September, and being joined by his family one month later. The reception by the congregation has been most cordial, and the prospects are encouraging for a successful work. A Teachers' and Officers' Association has been organized in the Sunday-school, and it has been decided to grade and organize the whole school on the International Standard during December. The various organizations of the church and Sunday-school owing part of their pledges to the new church building fund, are striving to make full payment before January 1. This is one of our great churches numerically, and with organization and application of system it can enjoy a most prosperous future. There was one confession October 15. Just now the churches and moral people of the community are engaged in a united effort to put out the saloons at election day, November 7. The town went dry by five votes at an election a year or two ago, but by shrewd methods it was declared in the courts to be wet by one vote.

Third District Notes

In the July board meeting it was decided that the present secretary continue his office till the close of the year May 31, 1911, even though his work is now in the Fifth District. Churches will please address him in Petersburg, Ill.

The following named officers will be glad to serve you in any work of the District, do not hesitate to call on them. L. G. Huff, president, Mt. Sterling; F. L. Moore, vice-president, Abingdon, A. I. Zeller, secretary, Petersburg. H. J. Reynolds, Camp Point, and C. Lee Stauffer, Dallas City; advisors. J. D. Williams is our district worker and is ready to come to any church needing help in any line of church work. Keep him busy.

Several of our good churches are without pastors—Cuba, Ipava, Table Grove, Lewistown, Stronghurst. Brother Geo. Burnett of Summum writes that he will close his work there Jan. 1. He is a good man and should be kept in the third district. Write him.

Let all the churches remember Illinois Day. The good work done in our district is only possible by your hearty coöperation.

A. I. Zeller, Sec'y.

R. A. Long at Cotner University, Nebr.

On Monday, Nov. 30, Cotner University was honored by that Prince in Israel, R. A. Long, of Kansas City. While the hour at the college was not the best one for a public meeting, Monday at 10 a. m., because Monday is a holiday at the school, nevertheless it was a great meeting that we had. The meeting was looked for with much pleasure by our people. When the time came for the meeting the chapel was crowded to its very door. When Brother Long arrived he was given a warm reception. Mr. Shellenberger, whose son is a teacher in Cotner, was made to feel the special enthusiasm of the students. The address by Mr. Long made a deep impression upon our student body. His earnest and sincere words were much appreciated by all. His visit will not soon be forgotten. At noon Mr. Long spoke to the Lincoln Commercial Club, whose guest he was. At 2:30 p. m., he spoke at First Church. In the evening he delivered another address before a men's banquet, when more than 350 men sat down at the tables and enjoyed a rich spread of good things prepared by the ladies of First Church. At the close of the meeting Secretary Shellenberger made an appeal for support for the Brotherhood. A hearty response was the result. The pledges amounted to $1,191. Mr. Long announced that he would turn an equal amount over to the State Missionary Society and Cotner University. Namely that 25 per cent of that pledged should go to the Nebraska State Missionary Society and 75 per cent to Cotner University. On Tuesday night at Omaha $1,000 was pledged. It was given also on the same condition. So that in all $2,200 was raised. That will mean that Cotner will receive about $1,700.

But greater than these gifts has been the awakening that his visit has brought to our people along educational lines. We feel that his visit will stir our people to greater activity. Mr. Long has been with us and gone, but the good that he did for us abides with us and will continue to abide many days. It will be the beginning of larger things. May the Heavenly Father give him strength and length of days for a long and continued service for the King.

William Oeschger,
Chancellor of Cotner University.

Church Life

James R. McIntire has resigned the church at Santa Monica, Calif.

C. R. Hudson has begun his work with First Church, Pomona, Calif.

Greenfield, Ind., Church is about to install a $3,500 pipe organ, the gift of the women's society.

W. N. Briney is holding a meeting for the church at Liberty, Mo., Robert Graham Frank, pastor.

J. Franklin Baxter has taken charge of the church at Flint, Mich., going there from Third Church, New Castle, Pa.

Robert Simpson of New Albany, Ind., was extended a call to Central Church, Cincinnati, O., which he has accepted.

2,000 persons heard C. R. Scoville's closing sermon in Terre Haute, Ind., where he had held an evangelistic meeting.

C. E. Wagner, pastor of the South Side Church, Hannibal, Mo., is holding a meeting at Shelbina.

J. N. Crutcher has resigned at Kansas City, Kan., to accept a call to the church at Neosho, Mo.

Mrs. Laura De Laney Garst, of Des Moines, Iowa, is speaking widely among the churches of that state, and always acceptably.

The congregation at Missouri Valley, Ia., has purchased the tabernacle in which union meetings were recently held. B. H. Whiston is pastor.

It is probable that H. O. Breeden will accept the pastorate of Fresno church in California after the union meeting which he is conducting at Vacaville has been closed.

Roger P. Noe, pastor elect at Frankfort, Ky., recently paid a visit to his new parish into which he will move permanently December 1.

The new edifice for Shreveport, La., church will be dedicated in about a month by Charles R. Scoville, who will follow with an evangelistic meeting.

Miss Virginia Hearne, state C. W. B. M. organizer of Missouri, supplied the pulpit at Maitland, October 22, and organized an auxiliary in the afternoon.

Benj. S. Ferrall has entered upon his ninth year as pastor in Buffalo, N. Y. He was the recipient of many tokens from his people on the opening Sunday of the new year.

The church at Mason City, Ia., celebrated its twentieth anniversary by burning a $2,600 mortgage which it had carried for many years. There is great rejoicing in the congregation.

Quindaro Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Kans., is holding an interesting meeting led by the pastor, G. E. Ireland. Pastors of other churches in Greater Kansas City are assisting.

Burris A. Jenkins is giving a series of Sunday evening addresses on "Church Music in America" in Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City. The choir assists the pastor in an especial manner.

H. S. Saxton, one of our best known evangelistic singers, will aid Wm. J. Wright in the meetings which he will hold. They are available for the first meeting not later than the middle of November.

Oct. 29 was a great day for the church at Flanagan, the attendance at Sunday-school being 154. They have engaged Wallace Tuttle to sing in a meeting which the pastor, E. E. Hartley, will hold during December.

The Harrisburg, Ind., Christian Church which closed its doors a year ago as a result of the depletion of its flock by removal to larger towns nearby, has decided to open its doors again and will call a preacher.

The Brotherhood party headed by R. A. Long were enthusiastic over the reception given them by the church at Ashtabula, O. S. G. Buckner, the pastor, writes that he is enthusiastic over the great day the men enjoyed.

W. H. Rust of Burlington Junction, Mo., assisted Pastor Fred M. Lindenmeyer in a meeting at Pickering, Mo., recently. There were twelve additions, of whom nine were by confession. Mr. Rust's message is characterized as strong and scriptural.

Ray E. Deadman will close a three year pastorate at Glenwood Avenue Church, Buffalo, N. Y., Feb. 1. Mr. Deadman has been successful in building up an almost self-supporting work there with aid from the American Society.

William Oeschger held a meeting at Old Brownville, Nebr., recently which he characterizes as the "Battle at Brownville with the Aliens." There were forty-one additions. This is one of the first religious organizations established in Nebraska history.

A district meeting of the churches near Akron, O., was held at Cuyahoga Falls, recently. Lloyd H. Miller, of Akron, was elected president and B. W. Besaw of Kent was chosen secretary and treasurer for the coming year.

O. W. Lawrence closed his work at Decatur, Ill., with the last Sunday in October and began his new pastorate at North Yakima, Wash., November 5. The Decatur church has not yet called a pastor, but is in receipt of many applications for its pulpit.

The meeting at Portage La Prairie, Man., seems to be breaking Canadian records. 351 have been added in seven days of invitations. Ernest C. Nicholson is pastor and the Minges Evangelistic Company have the meeting in charge. Mr. Minges was trained under Chas. Reign Scoville.

George W. Watkins closed a good meeting at State Line, Ind., with thirty-two additions. Chas. E. McVay conducted the singing. The State Line church has an endowment of one hundred acres of Indiana's best soil. The income of this land is applied on the minister's salary.

E. F. Daugherty recently got into the local newspapers at Vincennes, Ind., by the interesting experience of refusing to marry a guilty party in a divorce suit and on the same day officiating at the re-marriage of a couple who had been divorced. This pastor surely had glory enough for that one day.

Royal L. Handley has accepted a call to the church at Kalamazoo, Mich. He will begin his work Nov. 12. Mr. Handley's ministry at Gurnee, Ill., has been successful. There have been eight additions in the past month in regular services. The Kalamazoo pulpit was recently left vacant by the resignation of O. E. Tomes.

Evangelist F. F. Walters, of Independence, Mo., has just closed a very profitable meeting with the church at Savonburg, Kans. A number were added to the church, but the pastor, Walter B. Zimmerman, says that not the least gain was the indoctrination of the membership. This congregation has almost doubled its membership in the past two years of Mr. Zimmerman's ministry.

J. O. Shelburne, pastor of Central Church, Dallas, Tex., preaches annually a special sermon to old people. His officers utilize a large number of automobiles in getting the old people out. His subject for this service the second Sunday in October was "The Source of all Comfort." Over 200 aged persons were present.

A. L. Clinkenbeard began his fifth year with the church at Ladonia, Tex., Nov. 1. Mr. Clinkenbeard was called for an indefinite term at the first and has met with nothing but harmony in the congregation throughout the years. He told his people recently that while there were some indifferent members among them, he did not know of one "kicker!"

John L. Brandt who recently returned from a trip to the far East and resumed the pastorate of First Church, St. Louis, has instituted again the popular Sunday evening services which appeal especially to the large constituency of medical students residing in the neighborhood of the church. The subject on a recent Sunday evening was, "The Science of Medicine and Surgery in Asia."

G. A. Miller of Washington, D. C., and L. E. Sellers, of Philadelphia will represent the Disciples on the new commission on Peace and Arbitration created by the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. C. C. Morrison and Prof. Alva W. Taylor will represent the Disciples in the communion in social service which is to hold a conference in Chicago this week.

C. M. Chilton, of St. Joseph, was re-elected president of the seventh Missouri District Convention, at its annual meeting, held last week in Maryville. Other officers were elected as follows: Baxter Walters of Lathrop, vice-president; F. C. McCallan of Savannah, secretary; W. C. Wyatt of St. Joseph, treasurer; C. A. Lowe of St. Joseph, superintendent of missions.

Hermon P. Williams of Albuquerque, N. M., held a short meeting with his brother, Mark Wayne Williams, in the Park and Prospect Church, Milwaukee. Mr. Williams' sermons are spoken of as masterly in Christian evidences. Great and permanent results will accrue from this meeting. A week of preparation preceded the meeting addressed by the pastors of five neighboring churches, on successive nights.

A letter from Mrs. J. Z. Tyler of Cleveland, O., tells the story of the gradual failing of her husband in whom thousands of his brethren, the country over, are deeply interested. His speech is very inarticulate. He sleeps poorly and demands constant attention day and night. The preternatural fidelity of Mrs. Tyler through the long years of her distinguished husband's illness is proverbial among the many persons who have visited this home.

Special efforts are being put forth by the church at Massillon, O., to interest young men in Christian work. The pastor, H. E. Stafford calls this the young man's age, and declares that the demands of this age upon young men make impossible the traditional adage concerning the sowing of wild oats. Mr. Stafford has arranged for young men to direct the services one Sunday evening in each month. At the first of these special services over two hundred men were present.

L. O. Newcomer, pastor of the Central Church, Connersville, Ind., is gathering material for a series of common sense sermons. He is visiting all the leading business men in the city, each of whom he asks ten questions. Among these questions are: "Why do so few men attend church?" "What are the chief shortcomings of the church which a minister might improve?" "How does the teaching of Christ comport with modern business?" and "What can the church do to improve its common usefulness?"

Herbert Yeuell is visiting among his old parishioners of fifteen years ago in Sangamon County, Ill., where he did his maiden preaching. The meeting is being held with Pastor C. C. Wisher, his successor at Bellflower. Great crowds are attending and a delegation visited from Bloomington Centennial Church, where Brother Yeuell begins a meeting with Milo Atkinson, January 6. His singer at Walla Walla, Wash., where he begins with Joseph Armistead, Nov. 12, is Archie Allen Bailey of Hutchinson, Kans.

The ministry of H. O. Pritchard at Bethany, (Lincoln) Nebraska, has been one of singular fervor and grace. The church has been led into the support of its new missionary on the foreign field and is connected vitally with all the organized interests of the brotherhood. The church leads the brotherhood with the largest volunteer mission band and the largest number of tithers. The beautiful and well appointed church home is the result of united effort in the present pastorate. Mr. Pritchard's five years of preaching to the students of Coltier university have been most fruitful in those intangible results elude tabulation.

The St. Louis papers announced last week that LeRoy St. John, singing evangelist, who is assisting in a meeting at the Compton Heights Christian Church, would perform the miracle of turning water into wine, as Christ did at the wedding feast in Cana. The occasion set for this attractive feature was a special service for young people on Sunday afternoon. Mr. St. John declared that the miracle would not be performed in a mere symbolic sense, but that he would literally turn the water into wine. It does not require much predictive power to say that Pastor Ben N. Mitchell would greet a large congregation on that afternoon.

A local paper in Muncie, Ind., uses the incident of the consolidation of the Jackson Street and Central churches, as an illustration of the possibilities and duty of Christian union. In this particular case the two churches held identical beliefs but were divided some years ago by factional strife. These two congregations were compelled to keep up the expense of separate church organizations. "Economically the thing was wrong," says this secular paper, "and it is just as well to consider economy in connection with church management as with any other institution. These two churches have chosen the sensible course, and if we cannot expect sense in a church, where shall we look for it?" In addition to this sentiment it should be also asked, If we cannot find the spirit of unity among the Disciples of Christ, where shall we look for it? Let us thank God for every healing of the wound of disunity which occurs among us. We congratulate George B. Stewart upon this happy event with which he begins his ministry in Muncie.

Religion and Patriotism

Thanksgiving is almost in sight! The Sunday-schools are getting ready to observe boys' and girls' rally for American Missions, November 26. Superintendents have ordered free charts and supplies, teachers are preparing the most interesting facts about our country to be presented to their classes, and pupils, old and young, are joyously anticipating what promises to be the greatest day in our Bible-school history.

The best organized educational campaign along Sunday-school lines, ever conducted among the churches of Christ, is bearing fruit—more abundant fruit! The offerings from states doing Sunday-school work are divided, and one-half returned to contributing states to establish new schools in needy places.

Such observance of Thangsgiving season on the Lord's Day preceding our National Holiday, renews the spirit of our forefathers—the spirit of devotion to country and to God. Patriotism taught in our Sunday-schools in a religious service is the finest exhibit of gratitude that seeks to render unto God offerings for his benefits through the year.

The American Society is emphasizing this year, without a special entertainment feature, missions in the Sunday-school hour. Our prayer is earnest, our faith is strong, and

New York Churches to Combine

As a result of the joint session of the official boards of the Lenox Avenue Church of Disciples, 74 West 126th St., N. Y., and the First Church of the Disciples of Christ, 142 West 81st Street, N. Y., held on Tuesday evening, October 24, it is probable that a consolidation of these two congregations will be effected in the near future, forming a new church to be called "Central Church, Disciples of Christ."

The Lenox Church is without a pastor at the present time, William Bayard Craig having resigned on October 11 to accept the pastorate of the First Christian Church in Redlands, California. A Pulpit Supply Committee was appointed by the Lenox Church to secure a successor to Dr. Craig and while securing the names of candidates, discovered decided sentiment towards consolidation with the First Church. After a preliminary meeting of several members of each church, the official boards of these two churches met in separate session on Monday evening, October 23, and each board passed a resolution in favor of consolidation.

At the joint session on Tuesday evening a committee of three members from each church was appointed to prepare plans for the consolidation. W. L. Fisher, pastor of the First Church, tendered his resignation, to take effect when the consolidation is consummated. The united church will have about 500 members and expects to worship in the building of the First Church temporarily. Formal action will be taken by the two congregations on November 8.

Our Field Glass

A survey of the Home Mission field for 1911 is gratifying to the board and secretaries. Churches contributed $68,439.88 which was $4,060.20 more than last year. Sunday-schools gave $22,237.41 or $5,555.70 increase for the same period. Individual gifts aggregated $3,984.55 or $1,723.58 increase. A decrease in bequests and annuities counterbalance these amounts and left the society with practically the same income as last year. Basing its estimate upon last year's increase, the Home Board opened new missions and granted appropriations to maintain important, strategic stations which will require $25,000 more than our treasury receipts show. A crisis is approaching the A. C. M. S. and heroic sacrifice and a larger fund must be provided this year, or retrench. Cost of living on mission fields, expense of evangelistic campaigns, support of struggling churches with a general stringency of public finances, call for special consideration of American Missions now.

A plan to raise one million dollars for American Missions by the opening of the Panama Canal, is arousing enthusiasm, but only about one-third of the churches are awake to its possibility, importance and magnitude. Already $120,762.06 of that amount has been raised. Four years remain till the celebration of our greatest national achievement, and with an average of $220,000 per year, a million can be raised. The Congregationalist last year gave more than one million for American Missions. With greater numerical strength than they, ought we not to raise one-fourth as much yearly or the whole amount in four years? Are we less patriotic? Are we less loyal to our Master?

C. A. Finch writes: "When the two oceans roll together let us celebrate the rolling up

The Gospel of the Kingdom

For Young People's and Adult Classes

The enthusiasm with which so many adult Sunday school classes have taken up the gospel of the Kingdom series this fall prompts us to present the outline of subjects for the entire year of 1912. The lessons come in the form of a monthly magazine—not quarterly, but monthly—at 50c a year. Dr. Josiah Strong is the editor of the series. Problems relating to men, women and the home are uppermost the coming year. The magazine is adapted to both men and women, whether young people or older folks. Send 5c in stamps for a single copy of the magazine.

of one million dollars for American Missions." Mark Collis declares, "We can do it. We ought to do it. It is a shame we are raising such paltry offerings for the conversion of the home land." Peter Ainslie says, "We certainly can expect to raise one million dollars for American Missions in five years."

These brethren express what dozens have written to the home office. Four hundred and fifty communities in Colorado with a population large enough to require a government post office, are without religious services either Protestant or Catholic, and one hundred and thirty towns with five hundred to one thousand people each without a Protestant church. Colorado is taken as an example of all the newer states, and provinces of Canada. Appeals equally urgent and reasonable from other viewpoints, are made to the American Board from the South, East and North. Wherever there is an opening for Protestantism, the church with open Bible should be established. In doing so we are lifting up the old flag of freedom by the truth, right of souls to worship God through Jesus Christ untrammeled by creedal, governmental, hierarchical or ecclesiastical domination not included in the domination of our Lord and Master.

Brethren is not our duty plain? The Lord of Hosts will give us no rest of conscience, neither day nor night, till we make a more worthy effort to cultivate the neglected parts of our native land. I. N. McCash, Secretary.

Hiram College

Oone of the most inspiring men's meetings ever held in Hiram was that occasioned by the visit of the Disciples' Brotherhood, trio: Mr. R. A. Long, C. M. Chilton and W. E. Hackleman. These men stopped off a few hours on their way from Cleveland to Pittsburg, Sunday, October 22, and delivered their message at a special meeting called in the college chapel. The interest, especially among the college men, was far beyond expectation, resulting in over one hundred students enrolling in the Brotherhood and the raising of a fund as Hiram's share of the assessment for Ohio, of $368. The announcement made by Mr. Long of his intention of returning as a gift, three-fourths of the entire amount raised in Ohio to Hiram college and the remainder to the State Christian Missionary Society came as a most welcome surprise, and helped to cement the spirit of gratitude which is felt by every disciple in Ohio toward Mr. Long for his great benevolent work.

County Workers' Conference

A Workers' Conference of the Christian Churches of Tipton county, Indiana, will be held in the church at Tipton on Monday evening, November 13, and Tuesday forenoon and afternoon, November 14. Garry L. Cook, L. E. Murray and Dr. Jabez Hall of Indianapolis, will be the leaders of the conference. The interests of the Sunday-school, Teacher Training, local and general work will be considered. The purpose of this conference is educational and the county officers are working to secure a worthy representation from each of the eleven congregations of the county. The county organization of the churches is also to be perfected at this meeting. Brethren of neighboring counties interested in the conference will be cordially welcome at all sessions. G. I. Hoover, Minister Tipton Church.

West Texas (Stamford District)

The annual convention of the Stamford District Christian Missionary Association was held in Abilene, Texas, on October 13, 14, 15. The attendance was the largest known since the organization of the Stamford District four years ago. The work has become so aggressive that an interest has been stimulated in all parts of the district and as a consequence representatives came from all parts of the nineteen counties of which the district is made up to aid by their council and presence the future developments of the work. The report of District Evangelist Wm. Pearn showed that he had organized five new churches during the year, held fifteen meetings, beside paying regular visits to parts of the district where his attention was needed to keep the newly organized work moving. The program of the convention was calculated to stimulate those present into greater activities in all branches of mission work both home and abroad, and there is no doubt but that the next year in this district will see greater activities along all lines. The needs of the district will be realized when it is known that it covers over sixteen thousand square miles and has a population of over one hundred and seventy-nine thousand. The one evangelist under the direction of the Association has far more than one man can do to meet the needs of the field.

There is need for several energetic men in this field and Wm. Pearn, district evangelist, Paducah, Texas, will be glad to communicate

The Best

Did you know that the Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 will be in The Life of Christ? That means that you will want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition is now being prepared to meet the great demand expected this fall. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

with any good men who would like to take up work in this part of the country.

St. Paul sailed over a rough sea, knowing little of blue sky or calm water. But he knew that he and his were not drifting before the tempest, their vessel was directed. The unseen Captain was on board; the close would be in the haven so long desired, and every day that haven was nearer, every day some part of the rough way had been accomplished forever. Come what might, certain victories had been won and were secure, and the end was not to be a wreck on an unknown coast.—W. Robertson Nichol.

The Bible College of Missouri

A MELTING POT.

In previous lines I have attempted to tell how the Bible College of Missouri is socializing its work, that it is a place where students not only learn, but live. This attitude is forced upon us by the very nature of our surroundings and student body. The University of Missouri is in a certain sense a foreign mission field. Students have come to Missouri from all over the world, and it is itself a local melting pot.

They have heard of the famous school of Agriculture, and have come. On arriving they have found to their pleased surprise that religion is just as thoroughly taught in the Bible College of Missouri. Under the headline, "Bible College Attracts," a local paper tells how our school helped to bring in the students from abroad.

Hin Wong, the first of the Chinese students at Missouri, had planned to go to Ohio State University, but at the advice of his friend, G. D. Edwards of Honolulu, he came to Columbia. Other Chinese students, learning of the religious advantages at Columbia, have gathered, until there are now several.

Hugh Lovell of Australia learned that the Bible College of Missouri was in the same town as the University of Missouri, thus offering chances for a prospective preacher to take academic work and an A. B. degree. He came and induced others to follow from Melbourne, Australia. The entire group are studying to become ministers in the Christian Church.

Thus the influence of the Bible College of Missouri extends over a wide area, and its name continues to grow abroad. Its missionaries are on the foreign field. Its students come from afar. Its young men are manning Missouri churches from its central and strategic location. This is the work of the Bible College of Missouri, and we want you to know it and be proud of your school.

National Benevolent Association Activities

The Association has just received a bequest of $1,500. A good brother remembered the "Lord's poor" in life and provided for them in death.

The Home at Baldwin, Ga., has been moved to Atlanta. The name has been changed from the Southeastern Christian Home to the Southern Christian Home. The new address is 299 Lee street, Atlanta, Ga. T. O. Hathcock, Equitable Bldg., is the president; Miss Bunnie Love, East Point, is the corresponding secretary and J. C. Gentry, Atlanta, is the treasurer.

The farm at Grand Prairie, Texas, used for the past six or seven years by the Juliette Fowler Home, has been sold. The Home will be located on a fifteen-acre tract in the suburbs of the city of Dallas.

Otis Hawkins, who has been the efficient city evangelist of Dallas, Texas, has been called and has accepted, to succeed Brother Bush, who recently resigned as the Association's Southern representative. Brother Bush did not improve, as he had hoped, by his vacation and so felt that he must have less strenuous work.

All of the homes of the Association for children, six in number, take children from babyhood to twelve years. They take mothers also.

The homes are, with a few exceptions, in great need of money. Do not let these worthy wards of the church suffer, brethren.

It will be necessary to spend quite a sum

The Rest of This Year FREE

All new yearly subscriptions for The Christian Century, at regular rates and ministers' rates, received before December 31 will be credited to December 31, 1912. This means all the rest of this year free! Now is the time for every reader to bring his friends into the Christian Century family. The sooner you act the more they get! Bring this offer to their attention this very week! The price is $1.50 in advance. To ministers $1 in advance.

THE Moral Leaders OF Israel

By Professor Herbert L. Willett

PART I, FROM MOSES TO ELISHA

This is the first of four parts, which will cover the entire field of prophetic activity in the Old Testament. In the present issue there are thirteen sections, as follows:

THE PROPHETS AND THE OLD TESTAMENT.
THE BEGINNINGS OF PROPHETIC WORK.
MOSES AND ISRAEL.
MOSES AND THE BEGINNINGS OF THE NATION.
THE RISE OF SAMUEL
SAMUEL, JUDGE AND PROPHET.
DAVID AND NATHAN.
AHIJAH OF SHILOH.
ELIJAH AND THE PROPHETS OF BAAL.
ELIJAH, DEFENDER OF POPULAR RIGHTS.
ELISHA, THE PASTOR OF ISRAEL
THE REFORMS OF ELISHA.
THE PROPHETS OF THE JUDEAN SCHOOL.

These studies and those that follow in the series have been in use in many Sunday-schools during the past year, in the weekly form in which they have appeared in The Christian Century. This first part is now thoroughly revised and published in convenient form for class work or private use.

It contains ninety-two pages, is bound in paper, and is sold at thirty-five cents the copy.

In the year just closed the Association aided over 1,500 different persons for a longer or shorter period. This is over two hundred better than the best previous record.

A Dozen Reasons For It

The offering from the Sunday-schools for American Missions will be made on the Sunday before Thanksgiving, November 26. Last year a very creditable gain of over $5,000 was made by the schools in this important offering. The prospect is bright for an even larger increase in the offering this year. We are glad to call your attention to a dozen good reasons why this offering ought to be larger than any ever taken before.

1. The needs of the field are demanding it.
2. It has been preceded in the schools by six months of definite, weekly, uniform prayer.
3. A series of monthly programs with illustrative charts have intelligently set forth the needs.
4. The exercise, "America's Need," is built on entirely new lines—a basis of instruction rather than entertainment.
5. There is being created a missionary organization in the local schools, missionary committees, secretaries, etc., which means more symmetrical and generous offerings to all missions.
6. Each local school has been definitely apportioned.
7. The American Society has been working at the Sunday-school problem a whole year.
8. Most of the State Boards have signed contracts to coöperate in the offering heartily.
9. The schools are learning that this is the one offering of the year, not only for Home Missions, but also for all our organized Sunday-school service in both state and national departments.
10. We have shirked our responsibility long enough to the incoming foreigners, and this offering is the one which must be used to enlarge our work here.
11. We have made a gain in the past year, moving from 1,387 schools to 2,112, and from $16,687 to $22,243, and, of course, we must keep on keeping on till the whole 8,000 fall in line.
12. The responses coming in from the first letters sent out regarding this offering are very encouraging. ROBERT M. HOPKINS, National Sunday-school Superintendent.

Notes From the Foreign Society

Our missionaries in Africa write that since the control of the country has passed into the hands of the Belgian government they receive more consideration than heretofore. Their prestige with the natives in all the country which they have opened is changed very much. One of them writes that he believes it is thirty per cent better than it was three years ago.

Four stations have been granted the society in Africa. These grants were made with the understanding that at each station a medical missionary would be found. The government officials need medical treatment and there are no medical men provided by the government. The society should have three or four medical men in Africa all the time.

B. L. Kershner of Manila, Philippine Islands, writes that the work in the central district is progressing very well. They had baptisms every week during the last month. Yesterday two were baptized at the Tagalog service. The interest manifested in the meetings is unusually good. He writes that at the American service yesterday morning they had the privilege of extending the hand of fellowship to two fine young men. One of them accepted a class in the morning Tagalog Sunday-school. He writes further that in the Bible College one class is about to finish Fisher's Manual of Christian Evidences and Campbell's Preachers' Companion. That class is now ready to proceed with church history, but books are scarce. We will have to do the very best we can.

The missionaries write from China that the flood and famine conditions in the Yang-tse Valley are terrible. The crops have been ruined, and property destroyed over a vast territory. Many lives have been lost. The rice crop is gone, and together with starvation staring the people in the face, and the unsanitation caused by the water, plague is inevitable. It will be a sad winter for our workers in China.

The revolution in China seems to be growing rapidly in power. As yet there have been no overt outbreaks in Nankin and other cities where our own missionaries are located. However these cities are liable to be involved at any time. So far there has been no inclination on the part of the Chinese on either side to interfere with the missionaries. The movement seems to be entirely against the Manchu dynasty. We believe the revolution, if properly guided, will mean much for the future of China. This is a time for earnest prayer for the work and workers.

One of our Western women who already supports a missionary under the Foreign Society writes that she hopes to be able to support another before the new year begins.

The prospects for a great campaign in mission study are very bright. There are many advance orders for the mission study book by Stephen J. Corey, entitled "Ten Lessons in World Conquest." This handy little book will be mailed for twenty-five cents. It will be from the press in a few days.

The Foreign Society made a good start on the new missionary year during the month of October. The receipts amounted to $5,489, a gain over the corresponding month last year of $1,617.

Church Bells

Bells have been made and will continue to be made of various materials and at various prices; in fact you will now be asked from $80 to $550 for a bell weighing one thousand pounds, depending upon where you buy.

"Blymyer" bells, which have been advertised for some time in this paper, are made, so the manufacturers tells us, of special composition and are entirely unlike other bells. They are exclusive also in design, having of course the general shape of all bells, but with the necessary differences in outline and thickness, which combined with the "Blymyer" composition, produce that excellent and pleasing tone with great volume of sound and carrying power and assures lasting service and satisfaction.

The composition employed by The Cincinnati Bell Foundry Company in making "Blymyer" bells enables them to sell their bells at a reasonable price with a guarantee covering satisfaction and durability.

Those intending to buy should remember that the "Blymyer" is not an experiment nor a cheap imitation. It is a highly perfected instrument for producing a great and agreeable sound for a reasonable sum of money. It is not an enlarged farm bell, neither is the buyer required to spend a lot of money to purchase valuable metal and then have nothing more in the way of satisfaction and service than is guaranteed to be had in the "Blymyer." The Cincinnati Bell Foundry Company of Cincinnati, Ohio, will be glad to send catalog and convincing facts to anyone.

BY MANY OF THE BEST SCHOOLS AMONG DISCIPLES

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

A New Book of Vital Religious Importance

The Divinity of Christ

By EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Dr. Ames' Book will be Widely Read

Previous announcements of the price of this book are hereby withdrawn, and the price fixed at 75 cents. This is due to the fact that the publishers have made a more attrac tive and expensive volume than was at first contemplated.

The Peril of Character

THE NOTE of alarm sounded in the older preaching has dropped out of the preaching of today. Formerly men could be frightened at the thought of hell or the imminence of death. But in this practical age of ours, when the problems and worths of this present world absorb attention, it is difficult, if not impossible, to make vivid to men's minds the solemn contingencies of the future.

To this practical difficulty there is added also the fact that modern men somehow feel that death changes nothing, confirms nothing, that it is but an episode in the ever ongoing life of the soul. The New Testament would seem to sanction the view that life is taken up on the other side of death precisely at the point that it is left off on this side of death. And as for hell, the materialistic and lurid imagery which formed a large part of the preaching of yesterday seems to answer to no reality in the souls of men of today.

Yet the religion that has no great note of peril in it is faulty and inadequate. Life is tragic at the core, and no soft speech can interpret its deeper meaning. If the thought of death and hell is pale and forced for men of health and action, there is in Christianity and in human life an equally grave, or yet more solemn, motive in the constant peril of character. This motive does not depend for its efficacy upon any doubtful interpretation of scripture or the survival of some fragment of superstition.

It is not what may happen to our persons that we need to fear, but what is happening in our souls.

Psychology is giving us today a set of conceptions which wonderfully re-enforce the teaching of Jesus as to the sensitive delicacy of the spirit of man. The tone of awe in which Jesus bade his disciples watch is amply fortified by every soul's self-introspection. In such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh—the judgment is executed. The judgment, that is to say, is instant and constant.

So long as we conceive the judgment upon our neglect or our wrong-doing as postponed to some great future day we miss life's most controlling motive. "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil." But the Christian message is that sentence is executed speedily. Judgment takes place with the act as well as after it, and not chiefly upon the person or his goods, but within his character.

This immanence of penalty, as contrasted with its remoteness, its postponement, is an insight which not only supplies the preacher with the note of alarum, of urgency, but it expands the inner world of the spirit with a sense of awe, such a sense of awe as gives the significance of eternity to the common life, to the common tendency of our thoughts.

If we remove the apocalyptic imagery in which Jesus framed his teaching on the judgment, we have remaining just this wonderful insight of his as to the delicacy of the spiritual nature of man, its liability to ruin through neglect or misuse, and the subtle and unconscious process by which its ruin may be accomplished. Over against the cocksure perfection of the pharisees he stirred men to challenge their goodness, to keep challenging it, never to assume that they were out of danger of falling.

Underneath the complacent goodness of many a man there works the canker worm of insincerity or sentimentalism or unconscious duplicity of ideal or sensuality or avarice or ambition. Character is never safe. No broad good-nature, no humane feelings howsoever sympathetic and responsive to suffering, no soundness of creed, no correctness of formal obedience can suffice to make character safe.

From a man possessed of such moral assets as these the Lord may be departing as he did from Sampson while he wist not. And unless preaching have in it this prophetic note of peril it fails to declare the whole counsel of God.

Social Survey

Two Great Naval Reviews

The greatest naval review in the history of the United States recently took place in New York Harbor, and at the same time, another review of somewhat smaller proportions, which included most of the naval vessels of the United States which were unable to reach New York for the greater display, was held off the Pacific Coast. This review was primarily for the purpose of showing the preparedness of the navy for any emergency which might arise demanding rapid mobilization. Rear Admiral Osterhaus, who is in command of the entire navy, was given only thirty days' notice of the review. Many vessels were just completing the year's work and were scattered widely. Some had been sent to dry-docks for repairs, but it is said that all except two were in line when the review took place. It was also anticipated that so notable a spectacle as the review of a large part of the navy would prove inspirational, and the interest of a large number of people aroused. In this, too, success attended the manœuver. It is claimed that at least 1,000,000 people saw the vessels during the four days of the New York review, and a proportionately great number on the Pacific Coast watched the squadron. Secretary Meyer frankly said: "The people pay for the navy cheerfully. I think they will be even more willing to concede its value when they see what a tremendous potential fighting power it is as an assurance of peace." Surely it was impressive to see twenty-six "men-o-war" and enough auxiliary vessels to round out an even hundred in line at one time. All told, the reviews, East and West, represented a total displacement of about 700,000 tons, and the vessels were manned by 35,000 officers and men. President Taft reviewed the armada on the Hudson twice, once while the vessels were anchored in line, and again as they steamed down the river. He was greatly impressed with the formidable showing, but sees room for improvement. He commended the officers and men for their preparedness, but added: "The equipment of the fleet is excellent, except as to the number of destroyers and cruisers and colliers in proportion to the whole number. We had in the fleet today, twenty-two destroyers, and to meet the full requirement there should have been approximately one hundred destroyers, or an average of four to each battleship." Other nations are building high-speed cruisers. To maintain the standard of the navy the President feels we should not fall behind, for, "unless a navy is maintained at the highest possible state of efficiency it is a needless extravagance." Mr. Taft will favor the program of building two battleships a year and smaller vessels in proportionate number. Had not these reviews been preceded by the negotiation of the international peace treaties, they must have proved a most depressing spectacle for enlightened men who are looking for the cessation of such a brutal and uncivilized means as war for settling international disagreements.

Shall We Burn Our Libraries?

It was to be expected that somebody, sooner or later, would begin to protest against the multiplicity of public libraries and to suggest the diversion of the Carnegie and other millions to other purposes. It is somewhat surprising, however, to note that objection to the accumulation of great collections of books should be made by a scholarly Englishman, no other than Lord Rosebery, and that he should have the temerity to voice his objection at the formal opening of the new Mitchell Library building, for the cost of which the Corporation of Glasgow, Scotland, has just expended $500,000. The distinguished statesman is reported to have said that he was filled with a hideous depression at this cemetery of books. Most of the books were dead. They shrugged their barren backs at you, appealing, as it were, for some one to come and take them down and rescue them from the neglect into which they had deservedly fallen. How many baffled ambitions and hopes and aspirations on the part of authors they represented! Folios which our generation could not handle; novels as vapid as soda water which had been open for a week; bales of sermons and political speeches, and forgotten science and superseded history, and biographies of people that nobody cared about. These were the staple of the publc library. Who could ever read them? But if amazement is expressed that a former prime-minister should utter such rank literary heresy, what shall be said of the comment of Mr. Edmund Gosse, librarian of the house of lords, who followed the noble lord's backsliding by writing to the London Times—a safety-valve for every bursting British passion—denouncing the mixed and doubtful blessing of Carnegie libraries, the superfluity of printed matter, the books that could never add anything to human interest, pleasure, or instruction. At latest accounts the British Museum authorities had not cited these two heretics before a court of justice, but the British Weekly comes nobly to the defense of public libraries, declaring: "Let it be considered how very few books there are in this country. Take a wealthy London suburb, and look round. There is hardly a great house which contains as many as a thousand books. In fact, a hundred books would be nearer the average. Perhaps, in the whole suburb of 100,000 people, there may be ten decent libraries, and no more. We confess that to us one of the most cheering sights in London and elsewhere is the new Carnegie libraries. They give a chance to the people. In these libraries the innocent occupation of reading is practised. It may not lead to more, but it may lead to more, and at any rate the mere existence of the buildings is a protest against the gross and oppressive materialism which is everywhere around us. . . . . Our own opinion is that it is impossible to have too many books. Every book, almost without exception, has some element of value. We venture to say there is not a biography ever written, however poor, that has not something in it. No great subject of debate is closed." When the conditions in the United States are considered it is not too much to say that next to the churches and the schools the public libraries are the most potent force of civilization. Nothing we have seen in recent years is more reassuring of the intelligence of future generations than the existence and use of the libraries which are to be found from Maine to Oregon and from Minnesota to Florida. Every intelligent citizen ought to aid them by willingness to pay for their maintenance and by thoughtful advice to young people upon the wisest way to use them.

Revolutionary Triumph in China

The revolution in China has already become highly important in the growth of constitutional liberty in the Asiatic world. It is significant that, contrary to all precedents, this uprising has seen few demonstrations against foreigners. At the beginning of hostilities both government and revolutionary leaders proclaimed their intention of protecting foreign interests, and both have kept good faith in that promise. The revolt is aimed at the Manchu dynasty. China for the Chinese is the slogan. For nearly 300 years the Manchus have ruled China, but they represent a distinct race and no bond of sympathy or of patriotism has ever sprung up to unite that race with the people it rules. The pure Chinese Ming dynasty, which preceded the Manchus, is now extinct, and the Young China party might be at a loss to choose a ruler should the present line be banished. For this reason revolutionists are divided. Some insist upon driving the Manchus from the country; others, more moderate, are willing to accept the compromise offered through the acting regent, Prince Chun, uncle of the five-year-old emperor. This compromise would virtually mark the overthrow of the dynasty, though a Manchu ruler would be left as figure head. The people are promised a national assembly with power to legislate and to originate legislation itself without waiting for the ministers to bring questions before them. Manchu princes have already been excluded from the ministry, but the ablest Manchu ministers have been given other important offices, as in the case of General Yin Chang, the minister of war, who succeeded two untrained Manchu princes as supreme commander of the imperial army. It is certain that if the revolutionists accept compromises, in the end they will be better off than if they hold out for the original demands. Too radical a change is doomed to almost certain failure, but if the half-way step is accepted and the people shall be educated to exercise some degree of democratic liberty, they will then be in a position to act intelligently under a more complete form of democracy. It now seems probable some compromise will be accepted, but both sides are sparring for advantage in drawing the agreement.

Our Lord took the apostles away out of the hurry and importunity of their busy life into a quiet place, from which they might presently return to do their work the better. He knew that a great part of the effectiveness of the kind of work which they were doing depended on the quality of their ministrations. Thus when one teacher remarked to another on their way to the college prayers, that those exercises involved some waste of time, and that the German students who do not have any such appointment get half-an-hour ahead of us every day, his wiser companion answered, "To a man turning a grindstone every moment is precious; but to a man living a man's life every inspired moment is precious."—George Hodges.

Methodist

Methodist Mission Money This Year.

The General Missionary Committee of the Methodist Church recently in session in Denver, heard reports as follows concerning finances of Methodist home and foreign missions. The data carried with it some disappointment, in view of hard work for missions that has been put in by laymen, but by both home and foreign societies explanations were presented. The foreign board, with headquarters in New York, reported an increase this year of only $34,000, and all of that was in the special account. Receipts for regular work fell off $84,000, and the board reports the large debt of $171,976. This debt was $98,600 last year, but this year an additional $73,400 is added to it.

The gifts of Methodists for regular work of their own foreign board were last year $1,072,997, as compared with $1,156,794 the previous year. Special gifts increased from $320,000 to $438,000, and so made the total for the year slightly in excess of 1910. The total in 1910 was $1,476,000 and this year $1,511,000. Philadelphia leads all Methodist conferences, with $36,000, and Pittsburgh comes next with $34,000. Baltimore Methodists gave $30,000; Central Pennsylvania, $33,000; New York, $26,000; and Brooklyn, which district includes much of Connecticut, $28,000. Chicago Methodists gave $27,000, and northern New Jersey, called the Newark conference, $26,800.

Home Missions and Methodist Church Extension are done by Methodists north under one board. Its headquarters are in Philadelphia. Its receipts this year were $1,006,756, as compared with $1,019,000 last year. The board is in debt $72,000, but unlike the foreign board was able this year to avoid falling into heavier debt. The gifts for home missions only last year were $765,000 and $728,000 this year. Gifts by conferences are relatively about the same as to the foreign board, Philadelphia leading, and Pittsburgh second. Pennsylvania is the Methodist stronghold in supply of missionary money.

Baptist

Baptists North and South.

The divisions in the denominations that resulted from the civil war are now an incubus upon the various religious bodies. The perpetuation of these divisions is the most illogical of all denominational divisions. That they do engender bad feeling and hinder Christian work is shown by this statement in the Baptist Standard (Dallas):

A scramble over territory by the two great Baptist bodies of America is unseemly to the last degree. The one over-ruling consideration should be such an arrangement and employment of forces as will best serve to preach the pure Gospel to all the people. This sentiment ought to be widely diffused, North and South. Pride of organization should have no place among us. We are not preaching, baptizing, constituting churches, building schools, etc., for conventions and boards, but to spread the Kingdom. With us it matters not at all whether a Baptist lives North, South, East or West. It does matter, however, whether he holds the truth and lives right. If we will give Baptist principles free play in the real Baptist spirit, without friction or strife or waste of energy, forces will adjust themselves and the right thing will come about as the waters find their proper level. What is the free Baptist policy for, if not to work according to its sort?

Baptists and the Social Question.

The consciousness of the social problem is to be found everywhere in the churches of today. The following admirable statement of one phase of the problem is found in the Baptist World (Louisville):

"When the church tells these people to patiently endure the wrongs they suffer, that they are necessary and inevitable, that she has no message of social salvation, that the Christian religion has nothing to do with the domain of man's industrial life, and exerts no influence there, when this is the answer of the church to the plea for some method of economic reconstruction, is it strange that your religion makes no appeal to the wage-earning class and that they charge you with trying to serve both God and mammon?

"Overtopping all other problems with which the church of this age has to deal is the social problem of reorganizing business and industrial life on a Christian basis. This problem can be solved. Let us have courage and faith to believe this. Indeed one solution has already been presented. The economic theory of Socialism."

Episcopalian

A Liberal Anglican View of Communion.

There is in the Anglican church in this country a section which without laying claim to such high catholicity as other sections of the church, has nevertheless the true catholic spirit of tolerance and inclusiveness. There has been a tendency in Episcopal churches to adopt a rigid ritualistic view of things and to limit the communion to those confirmed. This attitude would class them with the Hardshell Baptists of another age and make ridiculous their talk of Christian union. We are glad to find in one of the great journals of the church, the Churchman, the following words:

Can the highest Anglican claim more for our priesthood or liturgy or sacraments than the Jews could and did claim for theirs? Nevertheless, what did St. Peter say when he was accused—"Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised and didst eat with them?" His answer was: "I remembered the word of the Lord, how that he said, John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized in the Holy Spirit. If then God gave unto them the like gift as he did also unto us, when we believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, who was I, that I could withstand God?"

So then, now, it seems to me that it is our duty to follow this apostolic example—to apply St. Peter's words to our own conditions, and to say, "Can any man forbid bread and wine, that these should not receive the Lord's Supper, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?"

An Anglican View of the Baptism Question.

A minister of the Disciples of Christ was once rather shocked to be congratulated by a high church clergyman of the Anglican communion upon a similarity of views upon the subject of the regenerating work of baptism. The following extract from the pages of the Living Church will indicate how high Anglicanism contrasts two extreme attitudes toward baptism, and the one they accept:

In an address on Christian Unity recently delivered in Atlanta, Dr. Campbell Morgan of London, England, among other things, stated that—"Continually I am growing more careless of differences in ecclesiastics, and growingly I am more careful of the great Catholic doctrine of unity in spirit." Then again he said: "No man is a member of any church unless he be born of the Spirit, and no rite or ceremony, no matter how holy in itself, can make him so."

Surely here are statements which fairly represent the spirit and thought of a great deal of modern Protestantism, though of course only a small fraction of Christendom, yet it is that fraction largely that the present movement for a Unity Conference will have to consider.

Now, Christian unity can come about only when we recognize all the truth and all that is good in all the churches, and get down to the essentials of the incarnate life of the Son of God. It will be a narrow way in some things and not a broad way in those things. The broad way will be more divisive and destructive and disintegrating as time goes on, and that is what all sincere seekers after unity are deploring.

Christ made baptism an essential act for incorporation into his incarnate life. It is not man's act, but the church's act with Christ's authoritative command behind it. Baptism properly administered, i. e., by water in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, is the new birth into the incarnate life. That is what the New Testament teaches and that is what Christianity has taught from the beginning.

Congregational

Who Is the Heretic?

Since the days of Horace Bushnell to the time of Briggs and on to the present badgering of students from the leading divinity schools, there has been the question of heresy. It is well that we study just what form these alleged heresies take and compare them with other forms of unbelief more subtle and dangerous that lurk in the minds even of the professedly orthodox. The Congregationalist and Christian World states the case as follows:

We consider those Christians chargeable with heresy who have lost faith in the gospel and still remain in our churches and pulpits; who deny the ethics that Jesus Christ taught, and believe his life and teaching impracticable in our days; who oppose every new and inevitable forward step in the Kingdom of God; who cling to outworn customs which bear the very impress of paganism, simply because they are old; who refuse to follow the leadership of the spirit into the untried regions of the Kingdom.

If we must try men for heresy, we would not indict those who deny an ancient theory of inspiration, but those who deny that the gospel has power to meet the awful paganism of our modern cities. Here are thousands of Italians and Jews who have become practically agnostic. Here are thousands of young men who have gone mad over sports and theaters and vice. Here is the vast pagan city and the church deserting it for the quiet suburbs and well-to-do people. The very abandonment of fields that ought not be left is a confession of unbelief. But there are men who also openly disbelieve in the power of the gospel to transform the city into the City of God, to transfigure these abandoned thousands with the light of Christ.

Religion as an Experience

Past experience determines present experience. A discourse in German is meaningless to one who has never learned German. A class in higher mathematics would present nothing intelligible to one who has yet to learn arithmetic. The best music is noise to the untrained ear. The impassioned utterance of the prophet of righteousness is foolishness to the vicious and corrupt. Cleanliness is a source of amusement to a dirty savage.

Religious experience of the highest type depends upon careful and prolonged discipline in the search for truth and in the practice of righteousness. Absorption in the quest for money shuts us out from the enjoyment of pure and undefiled religion. Coarse amusements unfit us to appreciate the beauties of the Bible and the heroism of the missionary. The quietness and dignity of the worship of the house of God make no appeal to us if we have taught ourselves to admire boastful selfishness.

Jesus adapted his teaching to the experience of the learner. The woman at Jacob's well was neither mentally nor morally alert but so skilful was the Master that he awakened her to an interest in himself and in the religious hopes of her people. The church has need of holding before its teachers the example of the Lord in his service to the undeveloped. Modern journalism takes account of what the people know. It often becomes a follower rather than a leader, but, as a prominent magazine says, "Regard for the tastes and the standards, moral and intellectual, of those in the community whose tastes are least exacting and whose standards are least developed, * * * if subordinated to conscience and regard for good taste and high standards, can be productive of great good." The church does not have to part company with its conscience in order to bring its message within the understanding of everybody.

The apostles who stood before the court in Jerusalem displayed great boldness in speech and remarkable vigor and clearness of thought. They knew what they believed and they had a facility in discourse that seemed, to the Jewish leaders, out of harmony with their previous experience. The explanation is found in the statement that they had been with Jesus. While the learned men of Jerusalem had been occuping their minds with the opinions of other learned men, these Galileans had been living with one whose life was the truth. It is contact with culture that imparts culture. It is a great day in any home or community when a good man enters it. To become acquainted with such a man is to be convicted of careless living and to be renewed in faith. Max Müller said of John Coleridge Patteson, "To have known such a man is one of life's greatest blessings. In his life of purity, unselfishness, and devotion to man, and faith in a higher world, those who have eyes to see may read the best, the most real imitation of Christ."

It was personal experience that gave power to the testimony of Paul. He gave up family friends, property, and professional ambition for Christ because he knew Christ. The benefits of his faith were not matters of hearsay to Paul. He could say to men, "I know how the life is transformed by Christ." It is this sort of testimony that brings conviction. "There is much value," says Dean Bosworth, "in the historic facts connected with the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus to which we can call attention, but the gist of our testimony must be some personal experience interpreted in the light of these historic facts." It was his acquaintance with Christ that enabled David Livingstone to say, after his life in Africa had been accompanied by disease, anxiety, and separation from those he loved, "I have never made a sacrifice." His mind had been upon the good he was doing and not upon his hardships.

The marks of Jesus branded on the body of Paul certified to the intimacy of his relation to Jesus. He had shared in the suffering of his Lord. He who knows Jesus only when the multitudes crowd upon him to hear his word or to shout his praises does not know him. If we understand that we are enjoying priceless blessings through the influence of Jesus upon the minds and hearts of our ancestors, we have some knowledge of him. But we do not have the right sort of knowledge of him unless we see the world that is yet without his saving grace and unless we have a part in bearing his message to all who live in darkness and fear. This service we cannot render without the spirit of sacrifice. It requires that we face the criticism of ignorance and prejudice and acquire money and education not for display and cultivated ease but to lay on the altar of faith. [Midweek Service, Nov. 29. The Meaning of Baptism

VIII.—BAPTISM AND THE CHURCH.

The natural development of our series was interrupted two weeks since by the chapter on infant baptism. Up to that point we had discussed the meaning of the word "baptize" and the form by which baptism was administered in the early church. It is our duty now to go on from a consideration of the linguistic and historical questions to the more important task of interpreting the meaning of the act itself.

Much of the confusion of thought with respect to baptism is due to the fact that the ordinance has been, historically, isolated from the social institution from which its original and natural meaning was derived, and given a meaning on its own account. In New Testament times the ordinance was a simple, customary ceremony of initiation into a religious order. It possessed the same significance attaching to any rite of initiation, namely a device of good order, a means of social control. The people were not conscious of it but of what it implied. The New Testament writers give us neither an account of its origin nor an explanation of its meaning. All their references take for granted that it was an already existing custom whose meaning was well understood. As a consequence the opinion widely prevails, more or less vaguely, especially among immersionists, that the ceremony of baptism was given by special divine dispensation. In the controversy that has been waged over it it has been treated as a sort of Melchisedeck among social institutions, without origin and without genealogy.

Taken thus by itself, abstracted from its simple functional connection in church organization, the ordinance can be made to mean almost anything according to the philosophy or fancy of the interpreter. The various unreal and often unethical doctrines concerning baptism that have been exploited throughout the history of the church have been made possible by this lack of historical perspective—the social situation within which baptism arose and for which it had a natural meaning was forgotten. The mere bringing to mind of that actual situation should do more than any argument to disclose the utterly fictitious character of the many dogmas with which the simple ceremony has been overgrown.

The recognition of baptism as a function of religious organization suggests that it be interpreted as any other social fact or factor is interpreted. Such an interpretation would be classified as sociological in contrast to dogmatic interpretations. The Christian Century fully accepts the sociological view of baptism. Over against it, however, we wish to refer to the two outstanding dogmatic views which we may classify as the magical and the legalistic.

1. To the magical conception of baptism we need give put little attention. This is the view upon which the doctrine of baptismal regeneration rests. Quite early in church history an intrinsic potency came to be imputed to the act of baptism. It was taken out of its position as a social ceremony of initiation into the fellowship of Christ's followers and endowed with a virtue on its own account.

It was natural that baptism should have fallen victim to just this abuse. Placed as it was on the border-line between the old life and the new, the objective ceremony came to be designated by the very term regeneration. It was invested with all the efficacy which had in the early days attached to the inward spiritual qualities of faith and repentance. The growth of the doctrine that there was no salvation outside the church taken with the doctrine of original sin and the consequent practice of infant baptism raised the ordinance into a place of magical potency. It came to be frankly confessed that baptism might be efficacious without faith on the part of the one baptized.

This view of baptism reached its logical development in the imposition of the rite upon uninstructed heathen whom the armies of the Christians conquered in battle.

The doctrine of baptismal regeneration is thoroughly magical and superstitious. The physical act of immersion in the water is regarded as efficacious. Tertullian, one of the church fathers, gives an explanation of the magical potency of the water after this fashion: There was from the beginning a special affinity between water and the Spirit which had brooded over it at the Creation. The same spirit returns to the water if God be invoked and gives to it the power to impart sanctification.

All such magic as this has been historically rejected by our Protestant churches, and need, therefore, only be referred to here.

2. The legalistic conception of baptism must detain us at somewhat greater length. This view of baptism is held mainly by those who identify the rite with the physical act of immersion and see in it a "positive" command of Christ It is contended that the word "baptize" in the New Testament should be translated flatly by "immerse" or its equivalents. The command of Jesus to "baptize" all nations means, therefore, nothing more nor less than to immerse them in water.

The legalistic view elevates baptism to the same relative position given it by the magical doctrine of baptismal regeneration, but guards itself against a magical interpretation, first by insisting that the ordinance has no validity except when preceded by faith and repentance and, secondly, by lodging the saving potency not in the water or the ceremony as such but in the divine will which has ordained immersion as a test of the soul's loyalty and faith. Baptism (immersion) is an institution of the Lord's own appointment and submission to it is the initial and typical act in which the soul yields to his authority.

Among certain types of immersionists holding this view obedience to Christ consists mainly, so far as the weight of their explicit emphasis goes, in being immersed. Faith, repentance and baptism, the formula of conversion commonly in use by the Disciples of Christ, is often varied in their speech by faith, repentance and obedience. The obedience is tacitly assumed to be synonymous with baptism. Not a little of the passion that Baptists and Disciples have thrown into their sermons on the Lordship of Christ—a theme very common in both bodies—has been due to the pragmatic use to which that doctrine lends itself in the enforcement of immersion as the supreme act of obedience.

Thus, while guarding against the magical elements in the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, the legalistic conception makes baptism still more abstract than does the magical view. Legalism reaches the farthest limit in the sorry process of isolating this simple rite from its functional connection with the church. In the magical view the ordinance still performs the function of initiation. The magical view is never held as purely magical; the magic is always mixed with the idea that baptism is potent because it brings one inside the church. The church is the big matter, and membership in it is the ultimate guarantee of salvation.

But in the legalistic view the isolation of baptism is complete. It is not a means to a concrete end. It has no human, social meaning. It is an item in a transaction between God and the soul, and this transaction takes place in abstracto.

While it is true that those who hold this view of baptism believe also that those who are baptized are ipso facto members of the church, yet the conception of baptism as initiation into the church is not put forward. The ordinance is enjoined upon the convert as an act of intrinsic obedience to Christ, complete in itself. In sermons on baptism converts are not told to join the church, to be initiated into the order of those who are striving to follow Christ. They are told to obey Christ in this ordinance. Their loyalty and the genuineness of their faith are challenged by the Lord's command to be baptized.

With this emphasis upon baptism as an abstract institution of personal obedience, it is not strange that among Disciples and Baptists a ceremony known as the Right Hand of Fellowship has been invented to take the place from which baptism has been pushed by this legalistic theory. Lacking its symbolism, the so-called Right Hand of Fellowship comes nearer answering to the baptism of the New Testament than does baptism itself as interpreted by its legalistic advocates.

The mode of reasoning by which the legalistic view sustains itself is substantially as follows: There is no conceivable reason for being baptized (immersed) except the fact that Christ commands it. Baptism, therefore, is a sheer test of submission to the divine will, and in this is its essential virtue. If instead of baptism Christ had commanded his disciple to give a loaf of bread to a hungry child, such an act would not have tested the disciple's loyalty, for he could see some reason in the act and feel some human prompting to perform it. But baptism rests sheerly upon Christ's authority and to submit to it is, therefore, a pure act of obedience, unalloyed by any human feeling or moral insight.

The defective moral character that this conception imputes to Christ is, of course, obvious to every reader, and its crass legalism is repugnant to every soul that has thought its way far into the mind of the Master. The implications of such an apologetic for baptism might have been tolerated among the medieval schoolmen who were more intent upon logical than ethical consistency in the things of their religion. But that such a view could circulate in our own day in face of the profoundly significant discoveries of the moral teaching of Jesus to which we are accustomed, almost startles one. Nevertheless this view is boldly exploited as a ruling motive in much of the evangelism of the Disciples of Christ.

In a widely read religious paper published among the Disciples the following statement recently appeared which registers the marvelous surviving power of a dogma which the genius of modern Christianity indignantly rejects:

"A man may think that he believes, but his faith may not be strong enough to stand the test to which it will constantly be put in the Christian life. So, by the simple act of Christian baptism, his faith is tested in the very beginning. Man says: I believe. God says: Well, I will see if you do; be baptized! Man may say that he believes, but that is in his own heart, and the world cannot see it. Let him adequately express, embody, his faith before the world, let him illustrate his creed, by being baptized."

The story of Naaman's final submission to the prophet's arbitrary command to wash in Jordan seven times, and the ringing rebuke administered by Samuel to King Saul for disobedience to the letter of his instructions, furnish protagonists of this dogma with texts for many a sermon on the importance of exact obedience to Christ's un-understood command to be immersed.

This abstract treatment of baptism has produced a phenomenon in protestant Christianity, especially in immersionist churches, entirely without analogy in the church of New Testament days. These modern churches have developed a baptism consciousness. Their ministers argue and urge the duty of baptism. There is much preaching on the subject. The vast dynamic of the Lordship of Christ is put back of the ordinance. The sheer act of being baptized is invested, theoretically, with awful importance. As a "test" of loyalty to Christ, souls are challenged to submit to it to prove their mettle. Responding to such an appeal the candidate tends to carry with him into the baptismal water a fictitious heroism, an over-consciousness of baptism, as such, and an under-consciousness of the implications of the spiritual status which it confers. The creation of this baptism consciousness by these motives inevitably tends to eclipse the free insight of the soul into the great moral principles of Christ's revelation. To the mind that can regard baptism by immersion as a typical command of Christ, His ethical laws of brotherhood will sound thin and vague.

Now this baptism consciousness is totally without precedent in primitive Christianity. The apostles did not preach baptism: they preached Christ and baptized those who accepted him, with as little consciousness of the formality as such as we now put into the ceremony of the right hand of fellowship. Baptism as a specific act was not an important element of consciousness at all, either with preachers or converts. It was taken for granted. It had neither dogmatists nor critics. No questions were raised concerning it. The important content of consciousness was Christ and his salvation from sin unto holiness. After faith in Christ and repentance, the point at which moral heroism came in was not in obedience to baptism as an arbitrary "positive" command, but in the decision to attach oneself, in the face of the community, to the company of those who were already Christ's disciples.

The test of faith and loyalty was not in baptism but in the thing baptism implied—the willingness to assume the status of a member of Christ's church. The command to be baptized voiced by Peter at Pentecost and by Ananias to Saul was not a command to perform a specific physical act (though custom had made the specific physical act well understood by both speaker and hearers) but to decisively commit themselves to the church and accept induction into its fellowship. Baptism was this commitment, this induction.

In its original and natural setting Christian baptism was not an institution on its own account; it derived its significance from the church, of which it was the gate of entrance, the initiatory ceremony. Its meaning was not inherent in itself or in an arbitrary divine decree by which it was appointed; it was an institution of the church, and drew all the meaning it possessed from the church. It was the door into the church and, like a door, its meaning consisted in the function it performed in the larger whole of which it was a part.

In justice to the Disciples of Christ it must be said that the legalistic type of teaching in its crasser forms is obsolescent among them, except in unprogressive communities. But the fundamental error lying behind such teaching abides with us still, namely, that baptism in the sense of immersion is an act whose sanction rests upon the sheer authoritative command of Christ. The rite is still dissociated from its original and natural setting.

Not until the whole legalistic fiction concerning baptism is displaced by the plain, tangible social sanctions for it will our souls be able to discern what the commands of our Lord really are and be heartily willing to obey them.

Editorial Table Talk

—The splendid proposition described by Rev. A. L. Orcutt found on another page should indeed solve the ministerial relief problem so far as immediate needs are concerned. The name of the maker of the proposition is not given by Mr. Orcutt, but our readers can easily enough guess him. This is a big chance, pastors. Sieze it! Make December 17 the best day this too-long neglected cause has ever known!

—Great preparations are being made over the land for the observance of C. W. B. M. day, the first Sunday in December. The pastor can well afford to give over one of the services of that Lord's day to the women of his church to be used as an occasion of bringing their work to the attention of the public. A sermon in the morning interpreting the activity of Christian womanhood in missions would start the day well, and the women's own program rendered in the evening would put a climax on a most significant day.

—A writer in the Firm Foundation calls attention to the fact that instrumental music was used to accompany the hymns sung at the funeral of the late Professor McGarvey. The organ also was played when the bier was being removed from the house. This feature of the service is described as an outrage and a dishonor to the dead, in view of Professor McGarvey's well-known opposition to instrumental music in worship. Several years ago he withdrew from one of Lexington's larger churches because of the introduction of an organ. He removed his membership to a humble congregation which held with him in opposition to this "innovation." While the writer referred to indulges, perhaps, in much too drastic a characterization of the "insult" which the use of the organ at his funeral involved, it would seem that the more fitting course would plainly have been to conduct such a service as the conviction of the deceased would have preferred.

—Upon a second examination of Dr. W. T. Moore's communication, published last week, it seems that we misapprehended his statements with reference to The Christian Century's interpretation of the Disciple's historic position. At any rate, we do not now find the stricture upon whose assumed presence in his article an editorial response was promised for this week. All the points involved in the article seem to have been adequately considered in the two pages already devoted to it. Probably the editorial wish that some correspondent would raise the fundamental historical question was father to the thought that certain of Dr. Moore's statements had done so. Subconsciously, too, we probably assumed that if anybody would raise a question of this kind this venerable narrator and living embodiment of the past three-quarter century of Disciple history would be likely to do so. But we might have known, had the assumption come squarely before our eyes, that so authoritative a historian as Dr. Moore would be least likely of all our readers to raise that particular question! As it is, the treatment of this aspect of the problem can wait until in the evolution of our study it is more decisively called for.

Salvation Army and Christmas

The Salvation Army is planning to reach, at the approaching Christmas, in one form or another, 300,000 persons. It counts upon reaching 20,000 in Chicago; 8,000 in St. Louis; 12,000 in Boston, and at least 30,000 in New York and vicinity. The principal ways of helping this vast number will be with food and clothing. The Army's publication is to issue at Christmas 325,000 copies. It will contain greetings and commendations from Governors Dix of New York, Wilson of New Jersey, Hooper of Tennessee, Senator Warren of Wyoming, and others. Commander Eva Booth has just returned from the Pacific Coast enthusiastic over her reception by San Francisco, where city officials among others joined to honor her and her Army. She had not been there before, since just after the earthquake and fire. An enlarged Army work of recent date is a new orphanage at Spring Valley, N. Y., where are cared for 300 orphans. The American Army hears reports of enlarged Army work in England, and of relief work in China, among the natives of the disturbed provinces

Cementing Baptist Union

Prof. A W. Anthony of Bates College has resigned his chair and has been elected a special joint secretary of the Home, Foreign and Publication societies. Rev. Dr. Anthony represents the Free Baptists, and he now becomes a secretary of the three great societies of the regular Baptists, to whom the Frees have recently turned over their missionary work, including permanent funds. The plan is a part of the union measures of these Baptist bodies.

Reports from Rev. Dr. R. S. MacArthur indicate success in securing funds from Baptists, largely from southern ones, to assist the Baptist propaganda in Russia. As president of the World Alliance Dr. MacArthur expects to sail for Russia in about a fortnight, hoping to interview the Czar and ask for larger religious freedom, not for Baptists merely, but for all bodies, including the Jews. Dr. MacArthur will take part in the dedication of a new Baptist church in St. Petersburg, assist in Baptist services in Moscow, and then proceed on a world tour of inspection of Baptist mission work. He will be absent a year, and perhaps longer.

Muck-raking the Missionaries

Copy runs short with the best of professional journalists at times and the muck-raking movement in journalism which has exposed some hoary evils, is now running riot attacking some of the best things of our modern life. A recent article in Hampton's magazine against the missionary societies is in point. The following note from the Continent indicates that even men whose scholarship should make them cautious in writing fall into this tendency:

> Professor George A. Dorsey of Chicago University, writing to The Chicago Tribune a letter of Chinese travel, mentions "that distinguished American missionary, Dr. W. A P. Martin," and while quoting one of his books on another subject, remarks as a little digression: "Doctor Martin, by the way, is said to have made the statement that the combined efforts of Christianity in China could show less than a dozen honest, intelligent converts." It would appear from this that the sapient Professor Dorsey is a near relative of the "horse marines." Doctor Martin would not be still preaching the gospel in the streets of Peking in the ninth decade of his life if he had any such sort of notion, and it is perfectly certain that he never said anything which could by any means be twisted into this alleged quotation. Members of the Chi Alpha Club in New York remember with what triumphant fervor the veteran missionary, on his last visit home, recounted the marvelous way in which the Christians of China stood the uttermost tests in the Boxer time. If Doctor Martin had had the slightest discount to take from the quality of the professed native Christians whom he knew in such hosts he would certainly have expressed it in the intimate and confidential circle of Chi Alpha. Professor Dorsey ought to be ashamed to circulate a story so obviously incredible.

Mr. Lloyd George's Religious Affiliations

Some of our Baptist contemporaries have at last learned and given to their readers the facts regarding the church affiliation of Mr. Lloyd George, the British liberal leader and Chancellor of the Exchequer. It has been the custom of these good brethren to refer to him as a Baptist. The Christian Century several years ago gave the American public the truth, namely, that Mr. Lloyd George was a Disciple and not a Baptist. There is some comfort, therefore, in reading in the Journal and Messenger (Cincinnati) a correction of its own error and calling the attention of Baptists generally to the facts. This our contemporary does in the following fashion:

"A year or two ago (perhaps longer) The Journal and Messenger was in the same error with many of its contemporaries in reckoning among Baptists Mr. Lloyd George, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in England. We trusted those who professed to know. But the time came, perhaps a year ago, when we were convinced of the mistake and told our readers so. And now the error has been again committed, and even Dr. John Clifford, in his Philadelphia address, reiterated the statement that the noted Chancellor was a Baptist. Only recently The Examiner committed the mistake of declaring that 'from trustworthy information' it was able to say that 'he is a member of a little Baptist Church in Wales.' The Western Recorder now comes to the front with a letter from a brother of Mr. George, saying: 'My brother was baptized in 1875, in a brook that runs through Criccieth and passes in front of the old chapel at which the church then assembled ..... Since 1886 the church has assembled in their chapel called Berea, in the center of the town, and of this church my brother is a member. It is described as a community of baptized believers taking the Bible as their rule of faith and practice. It has no paid ministers, and meets and breaks bread every Lord's day. The plea of the church is for primitive Christianity, and for this amongst other reasons, it rejects sectional names and calls itself the Church of the Disciples of Christ, or some such scriptural denomination.' This of course stamps the church as not Baptist, but 'Disciple.' In former days it was Baptist, but it is not now such, and it seems to be very foolish to try to make it what it it not. Of course, we should be glad if Mr. George could be legitimately ranked as a Baptist; but truth is better than assumptions. We thank The Western Recorder for taking the pains to learn the precise facts."

The Disciples are relatively a feeble folk in Britain and are naturaly jealous that the credit of so illustrious a name shall not be offset by the mere fact that Mr. Lloyd George, as is quite natural for a Disciple, fraternizes freely with his Baptist brethren in London.

Not an Exception, but the Rule

Two leading congregations in Illinois have been recently left pastorless. They have received great numbers of applications from ministers who were modestly and properly willing to assume pastoral charge. One of these pulpits has been already offered to a most worthy and capable leader who has accepted the call and will soon begin his work. The information has come to this office that two of Illinois' younger ministers now working in more modest fields were successively asked, in an informal way, by the other church, whether they would consider a call to the larger and more attractive field. Both responded that while the work of the larger church was indeed truly attractive, they were engaged in particular enterprises which they could not in good conscience leave at the present time. One was building a church house, the other was prosecuting a definite religious program among the working men of the community in which his church was located. The change would have meant promotion and considerably increased salary. We do not refer to this because it is rare, but because it is really much more typical and common than most people know. It is, we believe, typical of the conscience that actuates the Christian ministry. The self-restraint and fidelity that was evinced by these men who preferred to see their present enterprise through, rather than carry to a new and larger field the memory of an unfinished task in the humbler one, reveals their true quality and heartens and comforts any who may have come to feel that Christ's ministers were becoming professionalized.

Let the Churches Act!

Against all his critics The Christian Century stands with President Taft in the advocacy of the arbitration treaties which will be placed before the Senate for ratification at the next session of congress. This is by all odds the biggest chance this Christian nation has ever had to put its international interests upon a plainly Christian basis. The attitude of ex-president Roosevelt toward the proposed treaties has seriously weakened the confidence of Christian leaders in his moral priority among the statesmen of this republic. The timidity and recoil which he betrays when he comes face to face with the proposition for the United States to actually practice the ethics of Christ in its relations with other nations is regrettable. There is today before the Church of Christ no specific duty more concrete and urgent than to see that these treaties are ratified.

Church leaders are asking that Sunday, Nov. 26, coming just before the assembling of congress, be given over to a consideration of peace and how the churches can help to end war. Leaders in the several religious bodies are writing appeals and, backed by the national Federal Council of Churches, sending them to ministerial organizations for adoption, and to pastors to be read to their congregations.

The moderator of the Congregational National Council, Rev. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, is undertaking to secure the adoption of peace resolutions by every Congregational organization in America. Annual meetings of the benevolent societies in Milwaukee and Chicago adopted the resolutions. So have annual conventions of the Episcopal dioceses meeting this fall. Addresses by Secretary of State Knox, by Allen Baker, M. P., by Rev. Frederick Lynch, secretary of the Federal Council's peace commission, and others, are being printed and sent broadcast to ministers and to Christian leaders of all names.

The address of Cardinal Gibbons during his recent jubilee is being sent to Catholic priests. Persons well known in public life, yet not in politics, such as preachers, writers and inventors, are taking upon themselves the task of writing personal letters to pastors, to politicians, to almost everybody thought to have influence with United States senators. President Taft has drawn into his plan, almost without effort of his own, such effort by Christian bodies of all names and everywhere, as the oldest of church workers cannot recall.

Every congregation of the Disciples will be doing Christ's work by giving heed to this opportunity. Resolutions passed by congregations and letters written by individuals should be sent to both United States senators from your state.

Our New Department

The Christian Century finds great satisfaction in announcing a new department entitled "Modern Womanhood," to be conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison, of Lexington, Ky. Mrs. Harrison possesses one of the most influential minds among Disciple women. She was Centennial secretary for the Christian Woman's Board of Missions for four years, having charge of the Centennial campaign until its consummation at the centennial convention in Pittsburg, October, 1909.

In the interests of this cause she visited thirty-one different states and two provinces in western Canada, delivered three hundred addresses and traveled 63,602 miles. The Centennial fund reported at Pittsburg was $263,674.02, one of the most remarkable achievements reported at that epoch-making convention.

"The sisterhood of the Disciples," says the recently issued Historical Sketch Book, "acknowledges its debt to Mrs. Harrison for her rich services of leadership, characterized all the way through by gentleness, and faith and love."

Still prominent in missionary activities, Mrs. Harrison takes keen interest in the expanding and enriching life of modern womanhood. She served as president of the Kentucky Federation of Women's Clubs for the constitutional term and is now honorary president for life. Her voice has been prominent and influential in promoting civic betterment in her own city and state. She has served on the Board of Education and was a trustee of Lexington's Public Library—the only municipal offices open to women in that city.

In our new department Mrs. Harrison will treat freely all notable movements for woman's betterment. The title "Modern Womanhood" was chosen advisedly. There is an invidious implication in the usual headings of feminine departments which both Mrs. Harrison and the editors dislike: the implication that women readers will not be interested in any other department of the paper except this one prepared especially for them! The point of view from which the new department will be conducted will not involve any such reflection. It will rather assume that the interests of women are as wide as the interests of men and will seek to cultivate from the feminine point of view the widening and deepening of women's spiritual and mental life. Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive contributions from other writers, communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

The Coming Glory

BY G. CAMPBELL MORGAN.
London, England.

"For the grace of God hath appeared, bringing salvation to all men, instructing us, to the intent that, defying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly and righteously and godly in this present world looking for the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of our God and Saviour, Jesus Christ."—Titus 2 11-13.

Men are universally conscious of incompleteness, incompleteness in the realization of individual ideals, incompleteness in the realization of a social order, incompleteness in national and international affairs, incompleteness in the race itself.

It is not only such as are members of the Church of Jesus Christ who are conscious of this. It is a part of the common consciousness of enlightened humanity—one of the coincident experiences of advancement is this assurance of imperfection. In every age and in every clime men have looked forward to some better order of things. If they have not always so expressed it, men everywhere have lived in the belief that there is, after all,

One far-off Divine event
To which the whole creation moves.

No man is really ever satisfied with his own position, with his own times. If we could be silent enough, and if our hearing were acute enough, we should hear the whole race ever sighing and sobbing for something better.

The Christian fact has not brought that consciousness to the race, but it has come to interpret it—to fulfil it— and the proportion in which we are Christian men and women is the proportion in which the sigh has become a song, the hope has become a prophecy, the wonder has become a certainty, the mist has become a glory.

Our subject now is what the Christian fact says with regard to that hope of the race. I shall speak first of the place of hope in the economy of grace; secondly of the nature of the hope which grace presents; and finally of the particular application of the hope to the life of the child of God.

Grace and Glory.

First, then, the place of hope in the economy of grace. Grace is the necessary prelude to glory. Paul, in writing to the Romans, made an all-inclusive charge against human ity. "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God." The highest note in the anthem he sings concerning the work of Jesus is "We rejoice in hope of the glory of God." Between that statement of failure and that statement of hope lies the unveiling of the great plan of salvation—the gospel of the grace of God. Grace brings salvation, chastises men into perfection of life, exerts through such lives the influence that denies ungodliness and worldy lusts, and so paves the way for the march of glory, prepares the hour for its out-shining.

It is not merely true that grace is the necessary prelude to glory. It is equally true that glory is the necessary sequel to grace. Let men be saved, let character be re-created, let the race be redeemed, let every individual live the life sober, righteous, godly—then what? Then glory must follow, not as something which is the crowning of grace, but as something which is the outworking of grace.

Grace for Grace.

In the great gospel of the mystery of the Son of God, I read: "For of His fulness we all received, and grace for grace" and in Paul's letter to the Corinthians, "But we all, with unveiled face reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit."

John says we received his grace, grace for grace. That is, every line of beauty that was manifest in Jesus is to be realized in us. Have you seen the grace of his compassion? You shall have the grace of his compassion and be compassionate. Have you seen the grace of his lowliness? You shall have the grace of his lowliness and be lowly. Have you seen the grace of his power? You shall have the grace of his power and be powerful.

But what is the issue? Granted the grace of the Son of God, realized in human character, what is the issue? The glory of the Son of God is realized in human character so that Paul says, not grace for grace, but "from glory unto glory," being transformed into his perfect likeness.

The Great Event.

The epiphany of glory will be a definite event. That to which the apostle refers in my text is not merely the glory that is seen today, but something that is not yet seen—a finality, an issue, a consummation—something yet far on, and out of sight. Our Lord expected that it would be definite and personal, and that its definiteness and its personality were alike homed within himself. Our Lord said: "If any man shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed." When? "When He cometh in His own glory, and the glory of the Father, and of the holy angels." You cannot construe the words of Jesus to mean any spiritual coming, as something different from and contradictory to the fact of a personal advent.

Heaven on Earth.

But do not let us think of the second advent of Jesus in any small way. The first advent began nineteen centuries ago, and all this is still part of it. The second advent must have its beginning, but be very careful how you put measurement upon its issue. He will come to gather his own to himself, to set up the true order on the earth, to bring in the Golden Age. People are singing about heaven, thinking about heaven, and writing letters about heaven, and even writing books about heaven. There is nothing wrong in all that, providing they have not a wrong idea of what heaven is. They go to Revelation and read the story of the wonderful city, and they think it is heaven. It is not heaven. The city that John saw in Patmos is not heaven. Heaven will never come out of heaven. That city comes out of heaven, and is established here on the earth. The nations of the world are to walk in the light of that city. The picture is not a picture of the heaven to which we go. It is a picture of how God at last will set up his Kingdom here upon the earth. It is not a picture of how we win heaven. It is the picture of how God will win earth. And all this is connected with the second advent of Jesus.

The issues of sin are sorrow, disease, poverty, and all crime. When he comes the second time he will come to banish sorrow, to banish disease, to make poverty impossible, to hold crime in absolute check among the sons of men. When he comes again he will rule with a rod of iron. Have you read that passage and trembled at it? Have you ever dared to quote it to show that he will be arbitrary and unkind? The rod of iron, what is it? The rod of iron is the rod of perfect straightness and unswerving equity. There is nothing the world needs today so much as justice that can neither be bought nor sold. Justice that will be as easily meted out to the man who cannot afford it as to the man who can. Yes, we are crying for mercy; we need it. God have mercy upon us! But we need justice, too, as between man and man. Have you ever thought of one of the old prophetic words about his rule? "He shall not judge after the seeing of his eyes or by the hearing of his ears." The only way in which we can judge today is by the seeing of the eye and hearing of the ear. No man was committed to prison yesterday for long or short period, but by judgment that depended upon the seeing of the eyes and the hearing of the ears. I am not criticising it. We cannot do any better. But he will do better.

When he comes and begins his great and gracious reign all the things that issue from sin will be banished. Poverty, disease, and sorrow, and all else.

The Dream of the Race.

But the first advent was not merely the bringing of redemption, it was also for regeneration. Follow it to its issue. The regeneration of the individual must issue in the true communion, communism, social order. The end of self means the end of strife. When each man thinks not only on his own things but also on the things of others, we shall have the true social order. When every man knows God to be his Father and lives in right relation, the dream of the race will be realized. The restoration of individuals to communion with God must issue in the restoration of society to communion with God. What is that but the establishment of the Theocracy, the direct government of men by God?

I do not believe in democracy. I believe that democracy would be a far viler despotism than any the world has ever seen. I believe in an absolute monarchy, providing you find the true monarch. God has found him, and the world has not received him. But the true order is one supreme and only King, God; and all men living in obedience to his government and in mutual inter-relationship.

All this does not interfere with the question of whether he comes secretly or not. I am speaking of the whole fact of the second advent, in all its stages, parts, and issues, and these greater and larger truths of the glory of God.

What Is God's Glory?

What is the glory of God? God is glorified in the realization of the purposes of his own heart. The flower that blossoms perfectly glorifies God because it is what God meant it to be. The sun that shines in mid-day glorifies God because it is what God meant it to be. A man glorifies God when he is what God meant him to be. God will be glorified in human history when men have found his law, yielded to it, realized in their own persons and society all that God meant them to be. God's glory is not something with which he decorates himself as men decorate themselves in trappings. God's glory is the realization in the whole of his creation of the high purposes of his heart. And Christian faith sings the song of the coming glory. In the Pauline anthem, when he tells us we were justified by faith, that we have peace with God, that we have access by grace into the favor wherein we stand, he closes with the words: "And rejoice in hope of the glory of God."

Spoilt a Passage.

How we have spoiled that passage by imagining that the apostle meant that he saves us, and bids us hope for heaven. That is not rejoicing in hope of the glory of God. You, young man, young maiden, with the bloom of health upon your cheek and the elasticity of youth in your very step; do you imagine that you "rejoice in hope of the glory of God" when you hope to reach heaven? That is not what the apostle meant. What he meant was this: "We rejoice in hope" that at last God will be glorified, not by our reaching heaven, but by his possessing earth. The glory of God, in hope of which we rejoice, is the establishment of the Divine order upon the earth, and grace is working toward that end.

Nothing Lost.

The second advent will be a crisis that will gather up the work we have been doing and lead it on to future issues. Nothing is lost. What you have said to your Sunday-school class is not lost. The message you delivered in the open air is not lost. The prayers you are praying, mother, are not lost. Nothing is lost that is done in grace and compassion. You are flinging into human history forces that will wait for a crisis, and when, presently, the crisis comes, then prayers long uttered and forgotten will be answered; seeds flung into barren soil which have seemed to be dead will bloom into beauty. Glory will be the realization of all that grace meant; and when the King comes next it is to wind everything up and finish—it is to begin the administration and set up the order on the earth.

Dear Old Earth.

And dear old earth! Let no man abuse the earth. If you have any abuse, heap it on your own head. We have not begun to realize all its secrets. Dear old mother earth will laugh with flowers when the King reigns. O for his reign of perfect equity, of judgment! "Lord, come quickly," is the cry of the people who feel the pain and pang of earth's unutterable sorrow. This is the hope of the glory of God, the certainty that presently, he will come and take into his own service the things that are being discovered, and used, alas! today too often in wrong ways. Presently he will come and put his pierced hand upon the whole, and use them for carrying out the purposes of God, and establishing upon the poor, bruised earth the breadth, beauty and beneficence of the Divine Kingdom.

I am not at all anxious about getting to heaven. God will take care of that. I shall see him and reach that home by and by; but oh! I am anxious about earth.

Application to the Believer.

My concluding word concerns the particular application of this advent to the believer. Here I come at once into a narrow sphere. I only come that I may speak a word of comfort and helpfulness to the child of God. What application has that advent to the believer personally? First of all, it is the perpetual light that makes the present bearable. I pause because so many Christians today do not seem to live in the light of it. I sometimes wonder how they bear the toil, how they endure the suffering! I never lay my head upon the pillow without thinking it may be that before morning break, the last morning will break, and the King will come. I declare quietly and solemnly, that if you take that away from me, and tell me I have to convert the world by the preaching of the Gospel, then I give the whole thing up. But tell me I have to evangelize the world, to proclaim the news, and that presently he will come and consummate the work; then I sing at my work, and wait for the moving that presages the dawn, and long for the breaking of the light. That is the chief value, I think, of the advent in the personal life of the believer.

Reunion.

It will also mean reunion with the loved ones gone before. Do not be sorrowful as though you had no hope. Do not be anxious about those fallen on sleep. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." The first advent compels the second, and it is the first advent which is the rock upon which my faith fastens and sings the song of the coming victory. You ask me how? You tell me you do not see the way? I tell you grace has been manifested, and though I cannot see all the method I am certain of the issue.

How do the rivulets find their way?
How do the flowers know the day,
And open their cups to catch the ray?

I see the germ to the sunlight reach,
And the nestlings know the old bird's speech;
I do not see Who is there to teach.

I see the hare from the danger hide,
And the stars through the pathless spaces ride;
I do not see that they have a guide.

He is eyes for all who is eyes for the mole,
All motion goes to the rightful goal;
Oh, God! I can trust for the human soul!

The First Half Decade

What the Laymen's Missionary Movement Has Done in Five Years.

BY J. CAMPBELL WHITE.
General Secretary of the Movement.

On November 15, 1911, the Laymen's Missionary Movement completed five years of life. Its primary purpose has been the development of intelligent missionary interest among laymen. The joy of the Movement and its sufficient reward will be to see all the churches enlarge their missionary policies and resources, until they are adequate to the evangelization of the world.

The past five years have witnessed the most extensive and inspiring increase of missionary interest during modern times. The greatest series of union meetings for Christian men ever held in North America has occurred during this period, for the one purpose of considering an adequate missionary program. Several hundred thousand men have been reached directly, and many more indirectly, by the challenge to participate in world-evangelization.

Thorough-going Methods Introduced.

Into thousands of churches thorough-going methods of missionary education and finance have been introduced. In a multitude of congregations and in some entire cities the number of systematic contributors to missions has been more than doubled by the methods recommended by the Laymen's Missionary Movement. Alongside of these direct results in the churches which have been awakened on missions, have come concurrently a general and successful effort for the payment of church debts, augmenting of pastors' salaries, increase in regular church attendance, and development of large numbers of inactive laymen into effective Christian workers.

It has been clearly proved that intelligent enthusiasm for world-evangelization is not a hindrance, but a distinct help to every other Christian activity. Along with the larger offerings toward missionary work abroad have also come largely increased gifts toward Christian enterprises at home. The message of the Laymen's Missionary Movement promotes interest in every department of church work. Many thousands of men's missionary committees have been appointed as the result of its agitation, and all of these include both home and foreign missions in their plans and activities. The financial canvasses promoted by the Laymen's Missionary Movement always include more adequate provision for the needs at home as well as for the work abroad.

Signal Financial Gains.

The financial gains to missions during the past five years are the greatest ever made during a similar period by the churches of entire nations. The churches of Canada have increased from $1,492,000 to $2,216,000 annually in their combined home and foreign missionary offerings. Taking the United States and Canada together, the increase to foreign mission work alone has been from $8,980,000 to about $13,350,000 annually, or a gain of about 50 per cent. In addition to this increase in current revenue, more than $5,000,000 have been raised during the past two years in special equipment or endowment funds for foreign missionary objects, by different agencies in the United States and Canada. With the accumulated momentum and experience of the past five years, it should be possible to make an even larger proportionate increase during the next five-year period. The Laymen's Missionary Movement hopes to render a much larger service to the churches during the future than it has in the past.

The genius of the Movement is the spirit of co-operation between the churches in behalf of the greatest task confronting Christendom. Co-operation develops sympathy, appreciation and confidence. The spirit of Christian unity has had a phenomenal development in connection with the conventions and work of the Laymen's Movement. Great communions are now co-operating with each other to a degree supposed to be impossible five years ago. All the churches have had abundant illustration of the fact that each can accomplish its best and largest work in sympathetic co-operation with other Christian bodies. They therefore require and cordially welcome the Laymen's Missionary Movement to enable them to act together in this great world task.

The Challenge of Missions.

The missionary program of Christ is the most powerful challenge that can be used to awaken and enlist men both within and outside the church. Many men have been led to Christ and into fellowship with the church by being confronted with the world's need and challenged to practical co-operation in the universal propagation of Christianity. Thousands of inactive men within the church have been aroused and set at work by the same appeal. The biggest thing in the world is the world. If the world-appeal fails to awaken and enlist men, no smaller appeal is likely to be effective. It is Christian strategy of the highest order to use the most powerful lever ever put into human hands with which to quicken and vitalize men's deepest convictions about the spiritual significance of life.

As a natural and inevitable result of the missionary awakening, far higher standards of Christian stewardship are coming to be recognized and adopted. Not only are many men beginning to use their possessions as a sacred trust, to be administered for the good of others and the glory of God, but they are giving their time, thought, energy and life, in increasing proportion, for the highest service of mankind. Prayer, the most expensive of all human effort, is being offered with multiplying frequency by laymen, including intercession for missions and all other worthy ends.

Christ's Message Universal

Best of all, the essentially universal in Christ and His message are coming to be more generally recognized. Christ is not a partial Saviour, either of an individual or of the race. No man has a right to a share in Christ's redemption for the world unless he prays and works to share that redemption with every other person in the world. Between evangelism and world-evangelization there is no essential difference except a difference in geography. Every man's appreciation of Christ and Christianity may be measured by his desire to fill the earth with the light of the world.

To meet the opportunities now confronting the church in the non-Christian world the entire present force of missionaries and resources should be at least doubled within the next five years. The Laymen's Missionary Movement is glad to be among the influences that have had to do with the creation of a new missionary atmosphere, and expects to co-operate to the limit of its power with the missionary agencies of the various churches, until the work of evangelization is actually accomplished. At the present time there are twenty regular paid secretaries of the denominational and interdenominational Laymen's Missionary Movement, who give their whole time to the work, and this number is steadily increasing. The Movement is not a spasmodic or temporary sentiment, but the expression of a profound and determined purpose to rally and hold the men of the churches to the patient accomplishment of the mightiest task ever committed to human agency.

"The life of a nation's commerce depends upon its export trade." The strength and virility of a nation's faith depends upon the length and power of its reach in the uplift of the depressed and needy nations of the world.

Disciple Leadership in Union Evangelism

Dr. Breeden in Union Meeting at Vacaville, California.

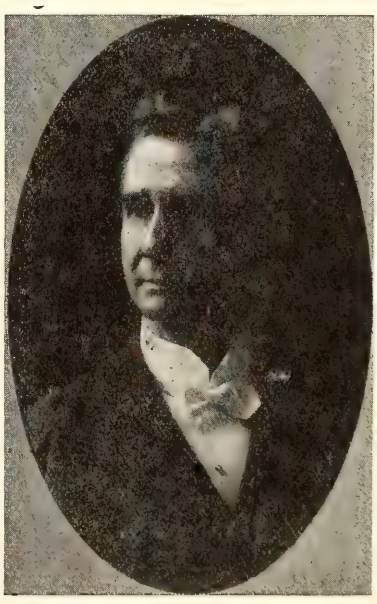
BY. FRANK E. BOREN.

Editors' Note: Can Disciples of Christ lead in union evangelism? This is a question which received a rather heated discussion a few years since in press and conference. An essay at such leadership was made by one of our most noted evangelists, who, to the regret of many, returned shortly to the single church meeting. This most practical and objective demonstration of the catholicity of the Disciples' temper and position, remains yet to be made. The meeting conducted by Dr. H. O. Breeden and reported by Mr. Boren, was unfortunately cut short by the death of the evangelist's father. But enough had transpired to indicate the lines along which Dr. Breeden would project such a meeting and to disclose the type of ministry which he would bring to it. The following account therefore has significance despite the fact that the community was not metropolitan nor the results sensational.

Vacaville considers itself fortunate in having had Dr. H. O. Breeden for a union evangelistic effort. It was only a ten days' meeting, abruptly closed on account of the death of Doctor Breeden's father, and cannot therefore be called great or remarkable, even if those words had not been so cheapened by too frequent use. But it was an eminently satisfactory meeting to all, and a delightful experience in Christian union. It was decidedly the best thing in the way of a union effort that the pastors of the town had ever experienced. It gave to the town a greater respect for religion and the church. It removed prejudices against evangelism. We were proud to have furnished the evangelist; glad, as one of the pastors expressed it, that there was nothing to smooth over after he was gone.

Disadvantages.

There are always some disadvantages in a union meeting. It is no indication of a lack of union spirit that a pastor sometimes desires a meeting in his own church alone. But on the whole the advantages outweigh the disadvantages. Among the disadvantages is the difficulty of making clear the conditions of church membership, which of course differ somewhat with the churches, and as a result some are left unchurched. An unchurched convert practically amounts to no convert. Much of this can be overcome by the pastors by further (or previous) instruction, and by the evangelist setting forth some general conditions, and continually emphasizing the need. This Doctor Breeden did with much tact and skill, so that there will be a minimum of unchurched converts. The results of the meeting prove that Disciple evangelists can and ought to hold union meetings more frequently than they do. Dr. Breeden apparently makes no alteration of his sermons to fit the special conditions of a union meeting. They need no modification, for a message that is not fit for a union meeting is not fit for our own.



Rev. H. O. Breeden.

A Poet Evangelist.

Doctor Breeden is our "poet evangelist." Sentiment, of a human and appealing, but not sentimental kind, has a large place in his make-up and message. A sermon is not complete with him unless it is a work of art. It is a much needed lesson that a thing is not quite good unless it is also beautiful. Truth, beauty, and goodness are the trinity of qualities which constitute the essence of religion. Doctor Breeden has lived in long and sympathetic communion with the beautiful in art and literature; and this adds immensely to the attractiveness and power of his message. There is logic in his sermons, and ethical appeal, but these are relieved of their repellant features, and made more forceful by the beauty of their presentation.

Impressive Scripture Lesson.

Doctor Breeden's practice of reading the scripture each night from memory adds greatly to the impressiveness of the service. In this practice there is nothing akin to that glib quoting of scripture, giving chapter and verse—an accomplishment often accompanied by a very meager acquaintance with the Bible outside of certain beaten paths, and a deplorable lack of real appreciation of the spirit of the Holy Word—which is the cheap accomplishment of so many evangelists. Doctor Breeden reads with the spirit of one who loves the message because of long and intelligent communion with it. The reading of Paul's address before Agrippa, or the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus, is made very impressive by this trained poet-elocutionist. There was perhaps more appreciative comment upon this feature of the meeting than upon any other.

Cumulative Power.

Doctor Breeden rightly described his method as that of depending upon the cumulative power of the gospel presented to the intellect, the heart, and the conscience of his hearers. The "high-pressure" methods are absent. He does not part company with dignity. He impresses the people as being a cultured, Christian gentleman, with a message of which he is not ashamed.

Results of Meeting.

The results of the meeting cannot be measured by numbers. Figures twist the truth when you don't intend them to. About sixty-eight signed confession cards, all but one of these being in response to the invitation at the two Sunday-schools. A few of the younger children will not unite with the church at present; but among those who signed cards in our own Sunday-school the majority will be baptized. I understand that not so large a proportion will enter the church from the Presbyterian Sunday-school. The Baptist, the other church in the union, is so small that it will not profit by the results. Five more made the confession at our morning service last Sunday, as a result of the influence of the meeting. About twenty will unite with the churches by letter. This result was encouraging under the circumstances. In the first place, it is a small field, a town of only 1,200, with a large foreign population. (The nerve of asking Doctor Breeden to come here! But nothing less would do us.) There is a hard crust of indifference which is exceedingly hard to pierce. The meeting was so brief that it was almost at a close before the people awakened to the fact that there was something "different" in the way of evangelism in town. Add to this the fact that there was only a week's notice of the meeting, and that Doctor Breeden did not have his own singers, and the results will appear very satisfactory. But the spirit of the meeting, and the spirit left behind, cannot be measured, and it was in this that there is to be found the chief good. I will be interested in hearing reports from Sacramento, only thirty miles away, where there is a larger field, and ampler time for work.

From the Denominations.

It used to be the fashion to report so many added from the "denominations." I am glad to revive that custom here in Vacaville. We received one from the Congregationalists, and one from the Methodists. These did not come, however, by way of the baptistery. It was not because they were converted from Congregationalism or Methodism to an acceptance of "our plea." They came because they believed us to be Christians, and we believed them to be. It was simply a mutual recognition of our common Christianity. We welcomed them to a church home, there being none of their own faith and order in the town. Moving to another community they will probably affiliate with the churches of their first love. In our community they preferred a home with us. I do not know just what you would call this plan, which our church unanimously adopted about a year ago, but for which, in a small community like this, we seldom have use. The fact is we have not named it. But what possible objection can there be to it?

Family United.

It may be interesting to report that two sons of the Congregationalist mother who came to us, confessed their faith in Christ during the meeting, and were immersed. It was not because they had read Campbell, or Briney, or even the New Testament on the subject of baptism, and were convinced that immersion alone was right; but because they felt themselves free to choose the practice of the church of their choice. They were immersed solely on the grounds of Christian liberty. It was to them a solemn dedication of their lives to Jesus Christ, and there was no more joyful witness to the rite than the mother.

The mother, by the way, Mrs. K. F. M. Cleaves, supervisor of music in the Vacaville schools, and choir leader of our church, was the competent leader of the music during the meeting. Her work was very satisfactory, though it was her first experience. As a soloist she is peerless.

One Criticism.

There was just one criticism which I heard of the meeting, and I mention it in the interests of the study of evangelism. The fault criticized was not characteristic of this meeting, but was reduced to a minimum by Doctor Breeden. The fact that such a small fault should elicit criticism from some whose opinion was most worth considering, is significant. It was felt by some—and I confess that I shared in the feeling, though I think I am over-sensitive on this point—that the invitations were too prolonged, and that there was a little over-urging. Yet the invitations were never extended over ten minutes, and generally not that long. It was felt that one morning service especially was partially spoiled, where there was a somewhat stronger pressing of the invitation than usual, after a very tender sermon on the Shepherd Psalm. Such a criticism in this meeting should set us to thinking. What shall we say when some evangelists prolong the invitation for an hour?

Book Agent's Method.

A book agent came to our house just the other day. As he showed me attractive colored plates, and glibly set forth the merits of his book, a strong desire to own the book sprang up within me. Is not this the psychology of much of our salesmenship, to keep the attention upon attractive qualities that awaken and strengthen desire for possession, and keep attention off of points that might be open to criticism? Is not this the psychology of the evangelism that seeks numbers at any price? Is not this method essentially hypnotic? In this case my calmer judgment prevailed, and I told the agent that I would think it over and see him again. It was surprising how my critical faculties awoke after he was gone. After thinking it over I bought the book, and do not think I will have occasion to regret the purchase. But how an agent's commissions would shrink if the majority of his customers took time to "think it over!" And, how the newspaper reports of our "greatest meetings" would shrink if, instead of telling death-bed stories, and singing "Almost Persuaded," for an hour, the people were told to go home and think it over and make their decision "tomorrow night!"

Overcoming Indifference.

Well, if the book agent were not interested primarily in commissions, but were moved by a philanthropic impulse to sell me a book which he honestly believed would prove an untold blessing to my life, a little over-persuasion might be excused. It might be necessary to overcome my indifference to my highest interests, and the interests of my family. And, if the evangelist were not interested primarily in numbers, but in souls, would it not take a good deal of urging to be called over-persuasion? There is much to consider; but we have here an evangelistic problem that cannot be ignored. What railroad could have been built; what trust could have been developed; what human enterprise forwarded; if it were not for the Napoleons of finance who over-rode the prejudices and indecisiveness of the multitude? But would we have had so much of "frenzied finance" if people had been allowed to "think it over?" Just how far is it ethically permissible for a strong will to influence another's choice even to that other's supposed advantage? These are vital problems for evangelism.

Rejects High-pressure Methods.

Doctor Breeden does not believe in these "high-pressure" methods, and has made an earnest effort to eliminate them from his meetings; but is not the fact that even he should be criticised for a minimum of fault of some significance? If we are to evolve a saner evangelism we cannot afford to ignore such criticism, and it is in the interests of such evangelism, for the advancement of which Doctor Breeden has done so much, that I give so much space to this phase of the meeting.

I used to think that God's gifts were on shelves one above the other, and that the taller we grew in Christian character the easier we should reach them. I find now that God's gifts are on shelves one beneath the other and that it is not a question of growing taller, but of stooping lower, and that we have to go down, always down, to get his best gifts.—Rev. F. B. Meyer.

Men and Religion Movement Campaign Reaches Dallas.

The Men and Religion campaign was in full swing last week at Dallas, Texas, and early reports from that city indicate a success greater than was anticipated. The details of the work to be carried on in Dallas were explained by the campaign leader, Mr. Fred B. Smith and his team of special workers at a banquet given by the committee of one hundred business men who have charge of the entire enterprise for the city of Dallas and surrounding towns.

In the course of a broadside occupying nearly a full page which is devoted to the Men and Religion campaign, the Dallas Morning News describes this banquet as one of the most remarkable gatherings that Dallas has ever known. Business men of all sorts and conditions, and pastors of local churches met together to discuss the welfare of their fellows. The News continues as follows: "Cares of the business world were for the time laid aside, incidents of the commercial world were forgotten, while together these men at the banquet gave their thoughts to the betterment of humanity, to action that has as its ultimate results the uplifting of mankind over all the world."

Fred B. Smith's Talk.

A number of the most prominent business men and professional men of Dallas addressed those at the banquet and then listened to remarks from the religious workers who had come there. In the course of a speech concerning the Men and Religion Forward Movement, Campaign Leader Smith spoke as follows:

"The time has come when we need to look men square in the eyes. By not admitting the women we will force the men to come if the family gets any benefit from the campaign. It takes some will power for a business man to close his desk at a few minutes to 4 o'clock and go out to a religious school. A lot of you will find out whether you are on top of your business or the business on top of you.

'The actual work of the Men and Religion Forward Movement is vastly greater than even the most rosy prophecy. It is no longer a faint hope. It is a winning movement in the eye of God. When the movement first came I thought possibly it could not endure, but it has won it's way and now is accepted by many of the greatest of all church men. They have watched the movement, and not only have they accepted it, but they have lent their aid.

"I am not pleading with you to take up this movement. You are already in it and I only want to show you that this campaign has the blessing of God.

Commercial Slackness.

"There is a slackness all over this country in commercial life, and such a time is always best for promotion of spiritual matters. There is a slack tide in politics, for which I guess we are all thankful. Congress will not do anything serious, for there is an election next year. This is the year of all years for the past twenty-five years to put religion to the fore.

"When I first realized the coming of the social side of religion I fought it, but the tide has been coming stronger all the time. Not once has there been a word of dissension between our experts on evangelism and social service. We are standing for the first time in the history of the church with these two factors side by side, aiding each other.

"The greatest day of these next ten in Dallas will be one week from Monday and Tuesday, when every minister in Dallas will sit down and talk with their own members. If Dallas is ever to be evangelized it must be by Dallas men. The visit of the specialists is only incidental. You Christian men must evangelize Dallas or it will never be evangelized."

Pleads for Men to Teach Boys.

Mr. R. A. Waite, leader of Boys' Work, followed Mr. Smith, and said that 65 per cent of the classes of boys in Dallas Sunday-schools are taught by women, and he wanted the men teachers to use every effort to bring out 100 per cent of their classes.

"We are after leaders and we want particularly to get in touch with the boys between 15 and 20 years of age," he said. Several other members of the team of specialists spoke, among them Charles Stelzle, Dean of the team, and minister of the great Labor Temple in New York City. What he had to say was plain and to the point.

"To carry out permanently and with any effect this Men and Religion program is a man's job," he began, "and there is no bluffing of it if you hope to succeed. This job of social service is an engineering job. I was trained as a mechanical engineer and I solve my problems this way. We want to impress the importance of knowing the facts in regard to Dallas. Enthusiasm is a great thing, but we must have facts, we must get at the heart of all conditions.

Institutes are Central.

"The institutes are the heart of the whole campaign, where you will get at the heart of things definitely and scientifically. The women have had charge of the church work long enough. It's time the men get out and do the work. I believe if you will work we will have large crowds of men at the institutes. The noon meetings will be great. Biederwolf will stir this town. All meetings will begin and end promptly at the hours announced. There will be no long speeches in this campaign. I believe we can make this campaign the biggest thing that ever happened in Dallas."

The banquet at which these men spoke served to bring the special workers and the active Dallas residents together so that they could become acquainted, and the next day commence in earnest the Men and Religion Forward Movement for that city and vicinity. The outlook is particularly bright, as interest is thoroughly aroused among all classes of men and boys. Hopes are entertained that the effort will have permanent results worth while in the community.

Ministerial Relief and the Proposition that Solves it.

For the past five years the board of Ministerial Relief has been pleading with the brotherhood for an annual support of $25,000 to this work. And the board made the promise last year that if the sum was received it would be able to pay the most needy of our old preachers an amount equal to one dollar a day. This would give them reasonable support, and we could then look the world square in the face and say, The Disciples of Christ care for their aged ministers. But, notwithstanding the splendid gain in receipts, the amount was not received. There is however, encouragement in the fact that each of these five years has shown a gain over the preceding year. The new money receipted for the year just passed, shows nearly $3,000 of a gain over the preceding year. The number of annuitants was the largest yet and they were paid more than in any previous year. The per cent of expense was considerably reduced. All this is good, and we are glad it is so, but it is not satisfactory because it does not fully meet the demands of the work. We believe our desires for this work are to be realized this year into which we have come with encouragingly bright prospects.

The ground of this expectation has in it two foundation stones. One is a proposition, the most liberal ever submitted in the interests of our Ministerial Relief work. The other is an abiding faith in a brotherhood we have always trusted to do right as the right has been understood. In this we are neither boasting nor handing out a taffy inducement. We have the proposition, and we are almost as sure of its acceptance. We have therefore called it the Proposition That Solves the Problem, for we do not feel that the brotherhood can in any reasonable way ignore it. The proposition is by one who is interested in this work, and who would have the church do her Lord's will in a matter involving her integrity and also the dignity of her ministry, and we herewith submit the proposition in the maker's own clear definite language as follows:

> During the next five years I will give one-fifth of any amount that our people may raise for said purpose, provided, however, that the minimum amount shall not be less than $20.000, and provided also that the maximum amount expected from me shall not exceed $6.000. To illustrate, if our people raise $20,000 I will give one-fifth of that amount, or $4.000, and so on, but in no event, as stated, should the amount expected of me exceed one-fifth of $30,000, or $6.000.
> Provided, also, that this proposition holds good only for the length of time I may live, i. e., if I should die within three years, then the offer ceases at that time.

How shall the church accept the proposition? The answer is simply by contributing the amount necessary to bind the maker. It takes at least $20,000 to accept the proposition. It will take enough of the spirit that moved the maker of the proposition to move the preachers to present it to their congregations to raise the $20,000.

Third Lord's Day in December is Ministerial Relief Day, and nothing should be allowed to interfere with the consideration and the support of this work. We have tried to reach every preacher in the brotherhood with a copy of our annual report just off the press. Any preacher can take this report, prepare an address and present the matter intelligently to his people. If he will do this and then give them a chance to make their contribution we are sure to meet the proposition here presented. And if we meet it this year, we can easily do it next year, then the next, and so on for the five years of the life of the proposition. By this time Ministerial Relief will have won its proper place among us and there will be no more trouble about its support. Much depends upon action now. To fail now is to cripple the future. Let there be an offering from every church. None should fail. If literature is wanted for distribution or envelopes for the offering, we will be pleased to send to any who will ask for and use them. Fix your mind on December 17. Make your exchange payable to Board of Ministerial Relief. Address 120 East Market Street, Indianapolis, Indiana.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES.

Topic December 3. Lessons from Great Lives. XII. Paul. 2 Tim. 4:1-8 (Consecration Meeting.)

We hear endless talk these days about the progressives and the conservatives. One would almost think that such conditions are peculiar to this age; but, as a matter of fact, they have been present in every age. This condition certainly prevailed among the Jews during the first century. Our Lord himself incurred the everlasting hatred of his people because he saw the inadequacy of the religious forms and customs of his day and said so. And it is in this same light that the apostle Paul appears most prominently. One of the first battles that Christianity had to fight in those early days was the battle against race prejudice which wanted to withhold the blessings from the Gentiles unless they became Jewish proselytes. Even the Apostle Peter faltered at that point, but the Apostle Paul who had completely sensed the Christian spirit went earnestly into Gentile territory and preached his gospel and received converts into the new faith.

He defended his action against all critics both inside and outside the church. Even he did not hesitate to rebuke Peter for his hesitation and to go back to Jerusalem and there relate his experiences as a preacher among the Gentiles and to defend his action before the Apostles and Elders. It was conceded by those assembled there that he had done wisely and he went back to continue his work. This did not end his troubles on that subject. There were those who followed him and attacked him, and lied about him. For many years he made a gallant defense, but finally with the help of the enemies of all forms of the religion of Jehovah, they secured his head. But before this was done he laid a broad and secure foundation for a universal Christian Church which should know no bound of land, nor face, nor time. Through all the succeeding centuries the stream of Christian influence has broadened and deepened. The church has gone on in its mission to extend the Kingdom of Heaven in all kinds of civilization. And it will continue its work building the notion of a universal brotherhood of all mankind. Such was his prophetic insight and the stream of blessings which flowed from it.

To this new vision he brought a zeal and a consecration which has been rarely equalled and never excelled. The fervor with which he breathed threatenings and slaughter against the Christians before the larger vision had come to him, he afterwards used to promote his newly found faith. There is little value for us to fight over again that ancient struggle. But we are still in the march of progres, and we also have those who would oppose every progressive move that we would make. It remains for us, therefore, to press for what we think is right, brave the opposition, defend the stand which seems to be right, and take the consequences. It may lose us prestige, cause us much inconvenience, and apparent failure but such is the price of progress.

In the deepest night of trouble and sorrow God gives us so much to be thankful for that we need never cease our singing.—Coleridge.

Things which never could make a man happy, develop a power to make him strong. Strength, and not happiness, or, rather, only that happiness which comes by strength, is the end of human living.—Phillips Brooks.

What is a stairway but a series of obstacles? Yet you rely on the stairs to help you mount to a higher place. If the life road had not obstacles to surmount, who would ever get up? No one can climb on thin air. —Wellspring.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Preparation of Women for Organized Work.

Each season of our year illustrates the truth that all nature passes through its period of preparation and awaits the fulness of time for its growth and development; it takes the fit season, the right environment before we can have the pageant of leaf and plant, of flower and fruit, of seed time and harvest; and what is true in the natural world is true also in the social and spiritual world.

Both the period of preparation and the fulness of time for women to work together effectively seems to have fallen in the nineteenth century—that was what Victor Hugo called the Woman's Century. At the beginning of that notable epoch, woman possessed no economic value outside the walls of her home. One hundred years ago, homes in this country were, in a degree, isolated and independent places, where almost everything necessary to family life was made or raised, and the women of the household composed the industrial army; they did the spinning, the weaving, the knitting, the sewing, the cooking—they made the soap, the candles, the butter, the lard, in other words, they took the raw product and turned it into the finished article ready for family use.

Economic Change.

Presently the introduction of machinery took many of these industries away from her, and deprived her of even the little importance she possessed as an econonic factor. Her entrance into the industrial field was assured when the factory system of labor displaced the hand labor system, for she soon arose and followed her "lost wheel and loom to their new place in the mill."

In 1809, but thirty-five women and children were found employed in factories in the United States; as late as 1840, when Harriet Martineau, the distinguished English woman, visited this country, she found but seven occupations open to women here—teaching, needlework, keeping boarders, working in cotton mills, type setting, book binding and domestic service. Lucy Stone had complained in that same decade, "When I came to seek a profession worthy of an immortal being, every employment was closed to me, except that of teacher, seamstress or housekeeper."

Lucy Stone's Influence.

When the spirit of Lucy Stone began to stir dimly in other women, and they felt they had certain God given faculties which demanded an outlet,—or as Ibsen said long after, that they "owed a duty to themselves"—and they asked admission to professions and industrial occupations, a storm of protest and ridicule was raised to which the present opposition to woman suffrage is but as a faint echo to a great battle shout.

Each succeeding census report on Women at Work shows the changes that a little more than a half century has wrought, for there are now over six millions of women engaged in all of the three hundred wage earning occupations, except six or seven. This economic importance has given her the self-respect and initiative that financial independence brings.

A century ago, the most rudimentary education was considered sufficient for women. Education beyond that was thought to be indelicate and masculine, and to unfit them for the special sphere to which God had assigned them. "Harriet Martineau must conceal her writing under her sewing when callers came, because 'to sew' was a feminine verb, and 'to write' was a masculine one. Mary Somerville must strive to hide her work from her relations, because mathematics was a masculine pursuit."

First Examination in Geometry.

The first public examination of a girl in geometry in Mrs. Emma Willard's school in New York in 1829, created as bitter an outcry as afterwards assailed women who entered the law, the pulpit, and the industrial profession. The familiar cry of neglecting the baby was raised then, and it was indignantly asserted that if the female mind mastered Greek or the higher mathematics, she would stop rocking the cradle to solve problems in geometry, and desert the kitchen to study Homer.

It was a long fight, and a slow fight before woman's right to a higher education was conceded; but she has come into her own at last, and now the only limits set to her scholarship are those which she puts herself.

Victory at Last Assured.

The struggle for these two fundamental rights—the right of choice of vocation, and the right to the same educational advantages that men had possessed so long—crowded the years of the first half of the Woman's Century. It was not until the last half was well on its way that assured victory perched on her banners. But even before colleges and universities opened to her, before she was permitted to enter the professions and industrial life generally, she heard the call of the great and needy world to use her new strength for its help and uplift.

In order to do this, there must be united effort—and so came the impulse to organization. With a trained mind, and a measure of financial independence, the period of preparation was well on its way, and it was the fulness of time for the beginnings of woman's organizations. I. W. H.

The Little Faults of Women

FRANCES KINGDON.

All the women but one had arrived for the little club luncheon and the hour she was due had long passed, so the perplexed and irritated hostess had decided to telephone to the home of the missing guest for some explanation of her absence. The answer from the maid was rather amazing—her mistress had gone down town shopping and said nothing about a luncheon party. The hostess tried to hide her mortification, but the guests, mindful of her slight and the empty seat at the table, indignantly expressed their opinion of such an action until one of the women spoke up calmly, "Why, don't you know, girls, that Mrs. A. has not meant to be rude or indifferent. She just simply has forgotten about her engagement here today. I know her well enough now to realize that whenever I have an appointment with her I must always telephone just before the time and remind her of the fact. It seems to be her way to be careless about engagements and as soon as they are made forget all about them. She never intends to be unkind or irresponsible, but is really unable to keep the matter of appointments in her head. There isn't any real excuse for this weakness, for she is not actually as busy as some of the rest of us and she won't keep an engagement book, but as long as we are fond of her we must forgive her this fault."

"Your kindly defense is accepted," replied another woman, "we'll simply remember after this that Mrs. A. belongs to the irresponsibles and has to be treated accordingly. I can forgive the friend who forgets her engagements and even the one who always is late, although it does take a great deal of patience to wearily wait for a woman who never knows enough to allow herself sufficient time to get to a place at an appointed hour. I used to sympathize with the tardy woman who never seemed able to arrive anywhere on time, but would rush in, breathless, and weary, as if she had made innumerable sacrifices to be there at all. Now I know better, for it is the busiest woman who is prompt. She has learned from necessity to plan each hour and be methodical about her duties. What I want to know today is how to treat the friend who has the habit of breaking her engagements. We all have a friend whose society we greatly enjoy, who are invited everywhere, but who can never be quite relied upon to be present. Somehow Fate deliberately conspires against us when we particularly want her presence at some affair. She is either visited by relatives from out of town, a sudden sick headache, a severe cold, the imperative demand of professional or domestic duties, and numerous other afflictions (?) which prevent her, at the eleventh hour, from joining our gathering. The spirit of "noblesse oblige" seems to be disappearing in the selfish rush of modern life and women in particular are growing unreliable about small affairs. They glibly give a promise, make an engagement with the mental reservation it is to be kept only if it is agreeable or convenient."

"I have a grievance just now," began a third woman, "against the friend who borrows and returns not. By this I do not merely mean the woman who borrows books, music, patterns or food without returning them, but the woman who takes our hands or our brains and forgets to give back the expected word of acknowledgement. How many times I have seen women do a bit of exquisite needle work for a friend—a fine baby dress, a cleverly trimmed hat, a dainty piece of fancy work—and never receive any acknowledgment from her. Doubtless some of you have helped a friend at one time or another write a speech, a club paper, an amateur story or poem, but have you always received the appreciation you coveted for such a loan. I ama mazed at the complacent, dishonorable way many women will accept favors which they never intend to return. While I would hardly like to believe that friendships are founded upon the interchange system of give and take, and modern hospitality consisted of an exchange of food, yet sometimes do you not grow weary of electing to an office a woman who takes the entire credit of her position upon herself, of making your hostess' party a success, when down in the bottom of your heart you know she would not or could not do the same for yours, of telling a gem of an anecdote or delightful bon mot to the woman who appropriates it as her own, just as she parasitically absorbs and then owns all your most original ideas, of being compelled to drink out of your friend's cup of affliction as well as your own and giving, giving, giving to the woman who never makes good."

"Her ingratitude in little matters, is what is worrying me now," said another woman; "I am still smarting over some small slights of this kind. When my daughter was in the hospital a few months ago she was attended by a nurse who seemed unusually thoughtful and kind. When we had our patient home again, I sent the young woman a little gift of silk stockings, as a token of our appreciation of the care she had given daughter. We have never received one word of acknowledgement from her although another nurse told me the gift had been safely received. This summer I rented a furnished house in one of the suburbs and finding two or three crab apple trees on the place I put some jelly for the owner to find when she returned from abroad. The little glasses, all sealed and labeled, would be a pleasant surprise I thought, but probably was mistaken, for she has never mentioned the jelly to me. We all have ungrateful friends who never acknowledge wedding presents, the baby's announcement cards, the flowers sent during ilness, or death, and many other acts of kindness which took our thought and time, but what shall we do with them?"

"We could talk all day," said the last woman at the table to speak, "about the little faults of other women. Sometimes they give us pain and hurt our feelings and again they deserve our honest contempt, for women rarely fail in seeing through each other, but we all have to be broad minded and sufficiently charitable to love our friends in spite of their faults. We make mistakes ourselves, do we not? so often saying and doing the wrong thing that will surely be misunderstood or cause a hurt, yet we want to be loved the same. Years ago I made up my mind that if I had a friend whom I really wanted to keep, I must not let any little selfishness or unkindness on her part come between us, and humbly trusted she would show the same patience and forbearance with me. Friendship, they say, is a sensitive plant, all too quickly bruised or blighted, but I would make it an immortelle enduring to eternity."

The Small Things

There is more effort, more steadfastness, involved in a diligent attention to little duties than appears at first sight, and that because of their continual recurrence. Such heed to little things implies a ceaseless listening to the whispers of grace, a strict watchfulness against every thought, wish, word, or act which can offend God ever so little, a constant effort to do everything as perfectly as possible. All this, however, must be done with a free, childlike spirit, without restlessness and anxiety. He does not ask a fretted, shrinking service. Give yourself to him, trust him, fix your eye upon him, listen to his voice, and then go on bravely and cheerfully, never doubting for an instant that his grace will lead you in small things as well as great, and will keep you from offending his law of love.—Jean Nicolas Grou.

"O Toil, thou stern, strong master,
Take thou my hand,
And lead me down life's highway.
Fill thou my days
With earnest, brave endeavor;
Make thou my life
A joy to other toilers;
Let my song be
A bugle call to cheer them—
Then, when at last,
The road leads toward the hilltop
Let my end come,
Among life's sturdy battlers!"

With the Children

A Little Island of Nothing-to-do

Barren and rocky out there in the sea,
Bold and as cold as an island may be,
Loneliest islands and sorriest, too—
Poor little islands of Nothing-to-Do.
Nobody wants them, for every one knows
Nothing takes root there, and not a tree grows, Nobody lives there. To tell the truth, who Wishes to stay where there's nothing to do?

The Little Snow Maiden

BY MRS. L. E. SMITH.

Tall pines, gaunt and gray, lacking in symmetry, huddle together up the lonely hillsides, even darkening the snow, which lies deep beneath their shadows. The young moon, like a a thread of silver, hangs high in the sky, and star after star begins to shine. The moan from the pines is answered by the wail from the "deep-voiced neighboring ocean," whose "accents disconsolate" echo from hill to hill.

In the deepening shadow of evening, something white glides down the hillside, now disappearing behind the trees, and again coming into view. Lo! It is the beautiful snow maiden, with great dark eyes and a white filmy robe—the queen of Klondike's hills and valleys, with all their golden treasure. She gazes all about her, when suddenly, far down the valley, she spies a flickering light. This is something new, and she swiftly glides toward it, scarcely making an impression with her tiny feet, upon the deep, crusty snow. With dilating eyes she finds a small cabin, from whose tiny window a candle is shedding its rays. She peeps through a chink, and her heart is filled with pity. Two miners are crouching over a log fire in one corner, while in another stands a rough bed. On a rude table are a few tin dishes and a scanty supply of food. Asleep in the middle of the floor lies a large dog, whose harness, together with the tools of the miners, is heaped in a corner. The firelight alone gives cheer for the faces of the men are not hopeful and they talk of gloomy things.

"They are so young," says the little snow maiden to herself, "I wonder why they are here!" Presently the word "gold" falls from the lips of the younger man, and her heart beats wildly. "Can they be here for that? Yes, it must be," she sighs, "for nothing else would lead them so far from home and comfort."

"It's Saturday night, Jack, I wonder what they are doing at home."

"Oh, let up, pard, you musn't get sentimental, you know; just think of our canned turkey and pudding. We'll have a dinner tomorrow that would make our New England mothers turn green with envy!" And raising his voice to a high pitch, he begins to sing, "Oh, Mister Captain, stop the ship. I want to get off and walk!"

The other man, unheeding this mock jollity, at last falls asleep by the fire, and the keen eyes of the little snow maiden discern a smile fluttering across his careworn face. "He is dreaming of mother and friends," says she and she longs to enter and whisper a word of cheer, for she knows where the richest gold veins lie; but she dare not go in for the fire is her deadly enemy.

"Oh, do you remember sweet Alice, Ben Bolt?" sings the younger man, but his voice is lost in the moaning of the wind, which surges round the cabin, and the little snow maiden turns sadly away, her white robe fluttering about her in the cold wind. She climbs the hill by a path she knows well, which leads to the snow castle in the valley beyond, where she lives with the grim Snow King.

The firelight dances no longer over the bare walls of the cabin, the dying embers alone lighting up the faces of the two sleepers, who are now forgetful of the cold and privation. One dreams of the Alice in his song, but she comes to him in a white fluttering mantle, with dark eyes pleading and soft. He tries to touch her beautiful form, but she slips from his reach. Still smiling and beckoning, she leads him far up a mountain ravine, where the pines are green and the sunlight streams brightly over the snow crystals. The wind has ceased—all seems to be calm, and he follows, enchanted, the beckoning, fluttering figure that guides on before him. All at once she stops, and he, breathless in his chase, is about to claim his beautiful prize, but she again speeds on before him and he follows a few steps further into a glen, where a cave opens under the drifted snow.

"Here is the treasure you long for," says Alice, "but only patience and long years will bring it to light. Do not hinder me now; the morning is flying and I have many miles to go before I reach my home."

She seems to flutter out of his sight, and he is awakened by the chill of the cold, dreary morning.

But the dream has made too deep an impression to be forgotten. While the miners are eating breakfast at their rude table, the younger one sings, "Did you dream in the night?"

"No, I didn't; but you must have, you were so restless."

"I will tell you my dream, but I am afraid you will laugh at the importance I attach to it."

"No, I had a dream once which came true, and so I will not laugh at yours."

"I only wish mine would come true," laughed the younger, but the only way it will, is for us to take up a new claim."

"How's that?" cried the older, "Leave our 'Old Precious' for some new strike?"

"Just that," replied the dreamer, "for last night a fair maiden beckoned me to one which she promised was richest of all; and her face charms me yet. I am at least going to go up the valley which I saw plainly in my dream, and see if her words are true."

"You are a fool, Jack," said the other man, but he looked wistfully after his partner, who disappeared among the hillside pines.

And this is why one of the richest mines in all Klondike was called "The Little Snow Maiden."

Happiness eludes every searcher for it, but comes quickly and abundantly to the one who seeks to bestow it upon someone else. The searcher for happiness may get wealth, and power, and fame, but none of these advantages will avail anything in getting happiness. Even from friends it cannot be obtained, for happiness comes from what is given out rather than from that which is gathered in. Loving, unselfish service, the persistent, enthusiastic effort day by day to bring sweetness, light, comfort, and goodness into the lives of others, will surely bring happiness into the life of any man, woman, or child. No sorrow of heart, no doubt of the future, no restlessness or aimlessness of the present, no loneliness or bitterness of soul, but will yield and be resolved into joy and peace and purpose as soon as the days are filled with labors of love—as soon as the eagerness to get happiness is replaced by an eagerness to give it to others.—Eugene Thwing.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

The Irwin evangelistic company is in a meeting at Literberry, with eight additions at last report.

Mr. Hill's meeting at Humboldt, added forty-two to the church. The pastor of this church is J. A. Sweet.

Adam K. Adcock's meeting for his home church at Carbondale resulted in two additions by confession on the first day.

Brookport Church will have the services of J. M. Ratliffe, of Arkansas. He has accepted the pastorate to begin at an early date.

J. J. Hudson held a meeting at Antioch near Oakland, in which there were received eighteen additions in two weeks, sixteen of the additions were on profession of faith.

The Sullivan meeting, conducted by the pastor, J. W. Kilborn with the assistance of E. E. Rice, closed with a total of six additions.

G. W. Burnett of Summum Church received two additions to the congregation on profession of faith the first Sunday in November.

The total number of additions so far in the Princeton meeting, where Vawter and Marty assisted Cecil C. Carpenter, was forty-nine, and the revival has closed.

G. S. McGaughey, after a pastorate of four years at Robinson, has accepted a call to Bicknell, Indiana, having refused a call for the fifth successive year at Robinson.

David Lindsay has accepted a call to the church at Latham to succeed Clifford S. Weaver, the new pastorate beginning the second Sunday in November.

Gilbert W. Zink, who has been pastor at Chambersburg since September 1, held a revival meeting in which there were twelve additions on profession of faith.

J. H. Garrison, editor of the Christian Evangelist, visited recently at Camp Point and preached at one of the Sunday services for the pastor, H. A. Reynolds.

Batavia Church made an offering of five dollars for state missions, and the Sunday-school raised in excess of fifteen dollars for home missions. The pastor is E. A. Henry, of Chicago.

The congregation of Central Church, Decatur, has invited Evangelist Lew D. Hill to act as supply pastor of the church until a new minister has been called to succeed O. W. Lawrence.

The revival meeting at Lake Fork added a total of thirty-seven to the church, twenty-eight being by baptism. The pastor, M. M. Hughes, had the assistance of Mr. Butler, of Missouri as director of music.

Harristown pastor, J. H. Wright, held a meeting for his home church which added five to the membership of the congregation. Mr. Wright had the assistance of F. R. McDonald, of Arthur, as soloist and precentor.

The additions in the Harvel meeting numbered thirty-seven at its conclusion, thirty of these being by profession of faith. A. W. Crabo was the evangelist who assisted S. R. Lewis, the pastor.

Andrew Scott, district evangelist of the sixth district, held a meeting for two weeks at Tower Hill, resulting in six additions to the church and in effort to locate a minister after a lapse of nearly a year without one.

The Endeavor Society of Augusta Church, where E. T. Cornelius ministers, is planning to study "The Challenge of the City," by Josiah strong. It is intended to have the society of the Presbyterian Church coöperate in this study.

Mt. Pulaski Church, of which J. Newton Cloe recently became minister, made an offering for state missions amounting to twenty dollars. The church here is progressing under the inspiring and efficient leadership of its new minister.

State Secretary J. Fred Jones aided the pastor, George W. Schroeder, in the dedicatory service for the new church at Bridgeport. A fine new church was formally set apart to the service of God, and more than ten thousand dollars was raised in a short time to liquidate indebtedness on the same.

The revival meeting at Pekin was concluded, having resulted in sixty additions, making a total of about one hundred additions during the present pastorate of slightly more than a year. C. C. Bolman, the pastor, was the evangelist in the meeting. He was assisted by Leroy F. Sargent.

The church at Pleasant Hill in Edgar County enjoyed a two weeks' meeting held by D. H. Shanklin, which added sixteen persons to the church, all but one being by profession of faith. Evangelist Shanklin is being assisted by Miss Roth as leader of music, and is now with the church at Antioch, in Shelby County.

L. B. Pickerill, of De Land, reports an interesting social function in his church, consisting of a reception by the Woman's Missionary Society of the Christian Church for the Woman's Missionary Society of the Methodist Church. The De Land Auxiliary has forty-two members and the Methodist Society has thirty-six. Miss Lura V. Thompson addressed a union meeting in the evening.

The revival meeting at Stuart Street Church, Springfield, with Pastor J. R. Golden, of West Side Church, assisting Pastor H. H. Jenner, has resulted in twenty-two additions, seventeen being on profession of faith. The meeting will probably continue another week. Splendid congregations are listening to the evangelist's message every night and interest is increasing daily.

First Church, Quincy, in its annual report recently presented, showed a total of forty additons during the year, making the membership of the church now four hundred and sixty-five. For benevolence and missions about twelve hundred dollars was raised. The edifice was improved at a cost of two thousand dollars, which together with the regular current expenses made a total of sixty-five hundred dollars raised and expended during the year. The pastor, Clyde Darsie, is deservedly popular with his congregation, and his invitation to the Jacksonville pulpit, announced last week, is not cordially received in Quincy.

The work with the church at Sterling, is slowly moving forward. The Woman's Missionary Society had a good attendance at its last meeting, and arranged a program of work for the year. On the same evening a Brotherhood was organized, numbering twenty-two. This number will likely be doubled soon. Last Sunday one of the young girls of the Sunday-school was received into the church. Others are looked for. The Brotherhood will assist in enrolling many that have not yet put in their membership, and in enlisting others in more active service. Chas. A. Stevens, has had charge of the work here since May 1, 1911.

Howett Street Church of Peoria celebrated its second anniversary in November. Reports were given from the various departments of the church indicating progress of a very substantial and evident character. During the year there were forty-two additions with a net increase in membership of twenty-eight, giving the congregation at present one hundred and eighty members. Mr. William Price has been pastor of the church since its organization, and for two and one half years conducted the mission which eventuated in the church. The congregation is self-supporting, and last year gave above two hundred dollars for the various missionary enterprises.

The Illinois Christian Citizenship Convention was held in Second Presbyterian Church, Chicago, last Monday and Tuesday. The special purpose of this gathering was to discuss vital problems of the civic relation of Christian men and institutions with particular emphasis upon the problem of getting the Bible read in our public schools. Addresses were made by Rev. Edgar P. Hill, Judge McKenzie Cleland, Bishop Charles B. Anderson, Rev. Jas. K. Shields, Prof. Allen Hoben, Rev. Robert T. Beattie, Judge Charles N. Goodnow, Rev. W. O. Shepherd and others. Questions of crime, marriage, liquor, juvenile delinquency, the home, the Sabbath, etc., were discussed by these eminent authorities.

Secretary's Letter.

Mighty stormy day the 12th. Bad for Illinois missions. Courage, brother. Hang on till you get a good offering. Never give up if it takes all winter. We must have your fellowship or give up some of the splendid fields we are supporting and let them go back. Such a thing would almost be a crime. Our Lord could hardly excuse such a course.

John B. Dickson, the new minister at Herrin, has just closed a three weeks' meeting with thirty additions. The work is in good condition.

The Centralia meeting, A. L. Huff, minister, closed with eighty-six additions. When we go down into Egypt to the state convention next year we will find a great, strong church at Centralia.

Prof. Van D. Roughton, county superintendent of Moultrie County, Sullivan, will do regular preaching half time within reach of his home.

The wind storm last Saturday, the 11th, completely destroyed the Twin Grove Church near Bloomington. Have not learned their plans but hope they will rebuild.

J. E. Stout held a good meeting at Jewett, reorganizing the church and adding about forty-five new members. He is now in a meeting at Six Mile Prairie.

H. M. Barnett had six additions at Hallsville in spite of the continuous rain and bad weather. He will hold a meeting for C. W. Marlow at Flora in January.

David A. Lindsay, formerly pastor at Deer Creek, now of Oklahoma, has accepted a call to the work at Latham and will begin soon. Glad to get our Illinois boys back, and they usually come back in a few

Chas. J. Upton, of Barnett, preaches half time at Atwater.

At the meeting of the state board on the 8th, two new members of the board of directors were elected to fill out the terms made vacant by the removal of R. F. Thrapp and O. W. Lawrence from the state. W. F. Turner, of Peoria, was elected to fill out Bro. Lawrence's term of three years, and W. W. Sniff of Paris will fill out Bro. Thrapp's term of one year. Bro. Thrapp was also president of the board and W. H. Cannon of Pittsfield was chosen to this position. We are very sorry to lose these good brethren from our state and suitable resolutions will be published.

At the last board meeting N. S. Haynes, of Decatur, was chosen to write a "History of the Disciples of Illinois." He has accepted the task and has already begun to plan the work. Such a book written by so able a man will doubtless have a very large sale when completed. This should have been done twenty years ago while many of the early pioneers were living and could give interesting data.

Brethren, boost the state offering just as high as possible.

J. Fred Jones, Field Secretary.
W. D. Deweese, Office Sec'y.-Treas.
Bloomington, Ill.

Southern Illinois Notes

W. O. S. Cliffe and the church at Christopher are going right forward to better things.

Visitors from the Benton church speak in the highest terms of their minister.

J. J. Harris serves the splendid little church at Tamaroa which is a child of the Du Quoin church where Mr. Harris served very acceptably for a number of years.

J. T. Sweatt has resigned the work at Murphysboro and is engaged in business in Du Quoin.

Du Quoin Main Street Church is going forward. Six added since last report. A brand new brussels carpet that covers the large Sunday-school room and a new organ just purchased by the Y. P. S. C. E. are among the necessary things added. A carpet warming was arranged for and the minister, Charles E. Smith, raised the money in a few minutes to pay for all in full. Last Lord's Day there was a large gathering when a splendid number of new pledges were made toward completing the financial budget.

A visit was recently made to the old town, Du Quoin, where the brethren conduct a union prayer-meeting habitually and where we hope to hold a short meeting at the request of those brethren.

I know a splendid young preacher, a graduate of Drake University, who for seven years has made a great record who will soon be open for engagement with some good church ready to do things. He believes in and preaches the Word and will be a blessing to the church that gets him.

Churches inquiring please enclose stamps for reply. Charles E. Smith.

Chicago

E. S. Ames reported four additions at Hyde Park church Sunday.

Chicago Heights church, E. D. Salkeld, pastor, closed an evangelistic meeting last Sunday, conducted by John G. Slater of Minneapolis. Mr. Slater made a deep impression upon the community. Chicago Disciples are especially proud of the Chicago Heights church because it is the only community hereabout, excepting Valparaiso, Ind., where we can claim leadership in numbers, property and effectiveness. The outlook before this church is especially promising.

Vaughan Dabney, pastor of Douglas Park Church, reports ten accessions recently. He is developing his church activities in co-operation with the community sentiment as far possible. This is more than ordinarily practicable in the case of this church on account of its being the only protestant English speaking church within a radius of one mile. The recent union with the Congregational body puts them in a position to build up a truly undenominational church of Christ, appealing for accessions not on grounds of doctrinal agreement but of co-operation in Christ-like service.

The unfortunate—scandalous is probably the better word—division of the church at Waukegan some years ago is now in a fair way to be healed. The First church congregation recently worshipped with Chapel street people at a Sunday service. The pastor of the latter church has, it is believed, definitely given up the leadership, and this opens the way for the rupture to be healed. The property suit will probably be withdrawn from the courts, where it has long been occasion for the newspapers to keep the quarrel before the public. A. L. Cole, formerly of Mt. Sterling, Ill., now studying in the University of Chicago, is preaching for Chapel street church, and Ellsworth Faris for First church. These leaders will coöperate to save a fast disintegrating situation to the cause of Christ.

Chicago Disciples have, the past week, enjoyed Charles S. Medbury, pastor of the great University Place Church, Des Moines, Iowa. His main purpose in spending a week in this city was to preach each evening of the "Home Coming Week" at Sheffield Avenue church. His sermons have been an uplift and enrichment of the life of that church. Large congregations have attended each night. From all parts of the city the people came, some churches sending delegations. Englewood church sent 100 on Thursday night with Pastor C. G. Kindred at the head and Jackson Boulevard, Evanston, Irving Park and other congregations contributed their quotas on other evenings. Dr. Medbury spoke at the ministers' meeting Monday morning. He was fresh from a week's participation in the Men and Religion campaign in Kansas City and brought to Chicago the virile heroic note which is being sounded by that movement. He pleaded, at the ministers' meeting, for a sacrificial Christianity. To follow Christ today will demand the same kind of self-renunciation that characterized the early disciples, he said. He deplored the unrestraint of church people in their amusement life and coined the phrase "commercial martyrdom" as describing the price many a man must pay in living out his Christianity in the business world. Doctor Medbury's address made a profound impression upon his brother ministers.

November Days

BY EMMA A. LENTE.

November's days are shortening fast;
Her morns are crisp with frost:
The Year walks with her, sorrowful,
Remembering what is lost,—
The leaves, the grass, the blooms, the songs,
Warm suns, and witching moons,
The billowing grains, the luscious fruits,
Soft showers and shimmering noons.

Yet, not uncrowned, and all forlorn
November treads her path;
St. Martin's Summer is her own—
That tranquil aftermath
Of slow, sweet airs, and dreamy days
Of slumb'rous, Orient calm,
Of far hills seen through violet haze,
And peace that soothes like balm.

And, later, when the chill winds blow,
And Nature charms no more,
November builds the cheerful fires,
And counts her treasures o'er,
And calls upon the whole wide land
To feast, give thanks, and sing,—
Forgetting all the toil and care,
The good, remembering.

Church Life

Marion Boles is debating with a Latter Day Saint preacher at Logan, Iowa.

The Snively meeting at Marion, Ind., is growing in influence and results.

J. E. Dinger has resigned the pulpit of First Church, Ft. Worth, Texas.

Evangelist H. F. Lutz is holding a meeting at Bridgeport, Conn., with West Side Church.

W. E. M. Hackleman is assisting C. M. Chilton in a two weeks' meeting in First Church, St. Joseph, Mo.

The Liberty, Mo., meeting conducted by W. N. Briney closed with over fifty additions. R. G. Frank is pastor.

Eldon K. Van Winkle has begun his work as pastor of Central Church, Findlay, Ohio. Mr. Van Winkle was formerly in Milton, Ind.

W. S. Cook has resigned at Nelsonville, Ohio, to take effect about the middle of next month. He has accepted a call to Wilkinsburg, Pa.

546 persons are reported to have been converted up to Nov. 12, in the Portage La Prairie meeting in Manitoba, now being conducted by W. J. Minges.

J. M. Lowe, Des Moines, Ia., of whose good work in the evangelistic field special mention was made in these columns, last week, can be secured for a meeting in December.

Fred R. Davies, Charlestown, Ind., has just closed a meeting at West Park Church, Indianapolis, W. D. Bartle, minister. Twenty-five were added to the church. The pastor says the prospects are good for the coming year's work.

First Church, Davenport, Ia., makes a good annual financial report, closing the year with a balance of $50 on hand and no unpaid bills. A budget of $3,300 is being provided for by pledges for next year. S. M. Perkins is pastor.

Mark Wayne Williams, of Milwaukee, Wis., is balancing accounts with his brother, Hermon P. Williams, of Albuquerque, N. M., by holding a meeting for him in exchange for a meeting recently held by the New Mexico pastor in Milwaukee.

State Evangelist G. E. Williams and helpers are holding a meeting in Vale, Ore. The outlook is bright for a good meeting. The congregation is building a house of worship which will be a credit to the community and a valuable instrument of religious work. T. L. Reed is the pastor.

A wedding announcment comes all the way from India telling of the recent marriage of William Charles MacDougall and Annie Agnes Lackey at Jubbelpore. They are to reside at Deoghar after January 1. The Christian Century extends congratulations to these worthy missionaries.

A call for a five year pastorate has been extended to S. Walton Fay formerly of Chorley, Eng., by the Valley Junction, Ia., church and has been accepted by Mr. Fay. This is an unusual period for a church and minister to engage themselves in advance, but it augurs the high degree of confidence on both sides of the compact.

C. O. Reynard has just closed a meeting of three weeks with Cecil Street Church, Toronto, Can., assisted by Mrs. Alice Dean Waldo as singer. There were sixteen baptisms, two other confessions and fifteen added by letter and statement. The church was greatly helped. Mr. Reynard's ministry in Toronto is energetic and progressive.

Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., is following up the Men and Religion campaign with an "Enlistment Week." Forty men are taking time from business to call upon their brothers who are not now enlisted actively in the church and urge them to share its responsibilities and joys. Finis Idleman is the devoted pastor.

The new house of worship of Canton, Ohio, church will contain a nursery and bridal parlor, the former in which to care for babies while their mothers are at worship, the latter to provide an appropriate and attractive place for the marriage of couples who do not wish a public or a home wedding. Pastor Welshimer's study will adjoin the bridal parlor.

After Evangelist W. J. Lockhart had arrived at Iowa City to begin a meeting with Pastor C. C. Rowlison it was decided that the church house was too small. A call for workers was made that night at the service to build a tabernacle next day. By evening the structure was complete and services were held in it. A good meeting is in progress.

When will the limit be reached in new devices for raising money for the church? A daily newspaper tells that a member of the Christian church at Mt. Sterling, Iowa, proposed to donate all the corn the ladies of the Aid Society would husk. Thirty-six ladies accepted the proposition and went into the field, remaining there two and a half hours, and husked 300 bushels of corn which netted them $176.60.

New Sunday-school rooms in connection with First Church, Evansville, Ind., were dedicated Nov. 12, by Robert M. Hopkins the national Sunday-school leader. This addition makes the house the most completely furnished building for Christian work in that city. D. W. Scott, the new pastor of this congregation began his work June 1, succeeding William E. Sweeney.

The Trenton, Mo., church, S. G. Fisher, pastor, held a Covenant Service recently at which the exercise prepared by Charles M. Fillmore of Indianapolis, was used. The morning worship was followed by a dinner in the church at which the fellowship of the members was most hearty. In the afternoon a business meeting of the church was held at which annual reports were given. The church girded itself for an advance work in the coming year.

The fourth annual meeting of the Medical Missionary Conference, held under the auspices of the American Medical Missionary Board, will be held at the Sanitarium in Battle Creek, Mich. January 2 to 5 inclusive. Rev. Lemuel C. Barnes, field secretary of the Baptist Home Mission Board, is to preside over the conference, and the attendance of several prominent mission workers is already assured. The Battle Creek Sanitarium offers free entertainment for one week to all the missionaries who attended the meeting, and the invitation is to all evangelical missionaries regardless of denomination. Inquiries may be addressed to Geo. C. Tenney, Battle Creek, Mich.

President James Benjamin Jones, of William Woods College, Fulton, Mo., passed away November 8. He was visiting his aged mother at the time in North Carolina. President Jones was born near Winston-Salem, N. C. He was graduated from Transylvania University at Lexington, Ky. He served as pastor of Christian churches at Columbia, Little Rock, Ark., and Los Angeles, Cal., and

Did you know that the Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 will be in The Life of Christ? That means that you will want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition is now being prepared to meet the great demand expected this fall. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

was connected with Hamilton College at Lexington, Mo., five years before removing to Fulton as president of William Woods. He had just entered upon his sixteenth year as head of the institution, being the second president since it was founded. Mr. Jones was an active participant in the church life of the Disciples of Christ and a prominent contributor to current journalism.

The unique evangelistic work which A. W. Conner is doing among the churches, appealing directly to boys, has met with singular success in Terre Haute, Ind., recently. Mr. Conner speaks to boys especially in the afternoons and to boys and adults in the evening. Much of his work with the boys is directed to drawing them together into an organized fraternity under the title of "Character Castle." Two hundred and six lads were enrolled in one week, all taking the studies by which they passed through various degrees which Mr. Conner conferred, capping all with a banquet. Each lad who enrolls for the work is asked to give the name of one man whose friendship the lad desires above that of anyone else. These men meet under the direction of Mr. Conner, who talks on the best way of influencing boys.

"How to Choose a Husband" was the subject of a recent sermon by B. L. Wray, of Budd Park Church, Kansas City. The meeting was largely attended by the women of the congregation, and they were given the following instructions for selecting a model husband:

"In courtship, before admitting a young man to your home, ask him, 'What is your business?'

"Require of him the same moral standards that he demands of you.

"Demand of him honesty, sobriety, industry and integrity.

"Shun the man who has no respect for old time religion.

"Don't marry the man who has no respect for his mother and no time for home."

The following Sunday night Mr. Wray told the young men how to choose a perfectly good wife.

Exercises in connection with the installation of Frederick D. Kershner as president of Texas Christian University were held in the Assembly Hall and attended by student body and citizens. Dean W. B. Parks presided. President Kershner talked on the influence of the church in education. His theme was "Co-operation of the Church and School." He emphasized the need for church influence in education, and was sure the greatest good in the history of the university would result from the cordial co-operation and support given it by the Christian Church of the state. Dean Parks spoke of the great influence of Christian education and expressed the view that the need was still as urgent as ever, that in the success of the past was every encouragement for similar work in the future. Cephas Shelburne spoke on the "Righteous Life." His fundamental idea was the need for the students to build spiritually as well as mentally and physically. The happy combination of the three was the acme of college education, he said. The outlook for the college is bright under its new leadership.

Dr. I. N. McCash, Secretary of the American Missionary Society, is taking his place as a representative of the Disciples in the Home Mission Committee of the Federal Council of Churches in America. This committee is conducting a series of thirteen "Surveys" in Western and Northwestern states, holding a "Day of Consultation" in each state to consider the "unmet needs" of that commonwealth. There are no large publicity features in connection with these "Surveys." The chief aim is to bring together in council those already charged with the responsibilities of home mission administration in each state. The effort has a profound public interest, but it has no general convention features. State representatives of home mission work of all denominations are being called into consultation with the national leaders of American church enterprise. The forces of all evangelical bodies are thus uniting in a program to investigate and satisfy the now unmet spiritual needs of the vast territory upon which so much home mission emphasis now falls and must continue to fall. The effort is a signal illustration of the possibilities inherent in the federation plan.

The words of Henry Watterson spoken at one of the services of dedication of the new First Church edifice in Louisville, Ky., will be interesting to many. Mr. Watterson is the famous editor of the Courier Journal of that city and noted for his picturesque and incisive writing. He said.

"I would have all the ministers of religion as free to discuss the things of this world as the statesman and the journalist, but with this difference—that the objective point with them shall be the regeneration of man through grace of God and not the winning of office or the exploitation of parties and newspapers. Journalism is yet too unripe to more than guess at truth from a single side. The statesman stands mainly for political organism. Until he dies he is a suspect.

"The pulpit remains, therefore, still the moral hope of the universe and the spiritual light of mankind. It must be nonpartisan; it must be nonprofessional. It must be manly and independent. But it must also be worldly wise, not artificial, sympathetic, broadminded and many sided, equally ready to smite wrong in the mighty and kneel by the bedside of the lowly and the poor, the weak and the afflicted."

The official board of Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, is now discussing a proposition to articulate the Sunday-school with the church in a more vital way than customarily prevails. The plan is to make the Sunday-school a department of regular church life, with the church officers responsible for its organization, its faculty of instructors and its financial obligations. The offerings of money from the members of the school will go into the church treasury as direct gifts to the church, the literature and all other equipment of the school to be purchased by the church treasury on the basis of a Sunday-school budget. This plan was submitted to the church officers by Professor Athern of the department of religious education in Drake University, who is also dicector of religious education in Central Church. It is every way deserving of the approval of this church and of all churches. The Sunday-school should be not an independent organization as now, but the church teaching the word of God. Such an arrangement as Professor Athern proposes, and which it is understood Pastor Finis Idleman heartily favors, will dignify religious education in the thought of members of the school and bring into active participation with the school the acumen and energy of the strong men of the congregation. We hope to be able shortly to report that the proposal has been accepted.

The Christian Monthly, organ of our English Disciples, edited by Rev. William Durban and Rev. Leslie W. Morgan, carries regularly on its front page a statement entitled "Our Aim," which in many respects is the best short statement of the purposes of the Disciples of Christ to be found anywhere. It is remarkable for its ommission of irrelevant detail, for its inclusion of every vital ideal and for its catholic and Christly temper. The statement follows:

> We strive to be simply Christians, without prefix or affix; we use only those names which are the common property of all Christians and all Christian churches, rejecting all denominational titles as unnecessary and divisive; we regard denominationalism as contrary to the will of God; we look upon the prayer of our Lord for the union of His Disciples as the thing of supreme moment in order to the effectual evangelization of the world; as a basis for union we hold forth the New Testament Church as the ideal in faith, ordinances and life; and furthermore, we hold ourselves ready to lose ourselves, together with our nearly one and a half million members throughout the world, and all our brotherhood organizations and machinery in a united Church of Christ on this catholic basis.

Who on the native soil of the Disciples' movemen can improve on this statement of our common faith?

Indiana Secretary's Notes

One more Sunday in November for State Missions. Will not every preacher who reads this try to enlist one more church? However weak and poor the church, it can give something and be the stronger and the richer for the giving. "Give and it shall be given to you," said the Master. Churches are saying that the missionary problem is a preachers' problem. "Like priest, like people." There are some churches, however, that have no preacher at the present time. The elders should see to it that the work is not permitted to suffer in the absence of a preacher. The elders have a duty to perform that cannot be shifted to other shoulders. Remember our commission, "Preach the gospel to the whole creation." That means in other parts of Indiana than your own community. During the first fifteen days of November only eight churches sent offerings. Some churches that took the offering in September have not yet sent it in. Please send all offerings promptly that the money may be used for the purpose for which it was given. Three hundred contributing churches is our aim for Indiana this year.

All churches that have adopted the "weekly offering for missions" system are requested to report the fact. We hope a large number of our churches will begin this plan with the new year.

Ira J. Harbaugh of Pittsburg was a caller at the office recently. There is a possibility that he will locate in this state. We need him and trust he may be secured by one of our many pastorless churches.

W. G. Winn, from Pittsburg, is the new pastor at Rennselaer. He has been on the field since August, but the information had not reached this office. Mr. Winn has missed some of the interesting communications that have gone out from the office. He is on the mailing list now, however, and will be treated as one of the family hereafter.

PART I, FROM MOSES TO ELISHA

This is the first of four parts, which will cover the entire field of prophetic activity in the Old Testament. In the present issue there are thirteen sections, as follows:

THE PROPHETS AND THE OLD TESTAMENT.
THE BEGINNINGS OF PROPHETIC WORK.
MOSES AND ISRAEL.
MOSES AND THE BEGINNINGS OF THE NATION.
THE RISE OF SAMUEL
SAMUEL, JUDGE AND PROPHET.
DAVID AND NATHAN.
AHIJAH OF SHILOH.
ELIJAH AND THE PROPHETS OF BAAL.
ELIJAH, DEFENDER OF POPULAR RIGHTS.
ELISHA, THE PASTOR OF ISRAEL
THE REFORMS OF ELISHA.
THE PROPHETS OF THE JUDEAN SCHOOL.

These studies and those that follow in the series have been in use in many Sunday-schools during the past year, in the weekly form in which they have appeared in The Christian Century. This first part is now thoroughly revised and published in convenient form for class work or private use.

It contains ninety-two pages, is bound in paper, and is sold at thirty-five cents the copy.

Mrs. T. R. Ayars, president of the Mothers and Children's Mome in St. Louis, makes an appeal in behalf of fifteen boys, ranging in age from a few days to ten years, who are wanting a chance in the world and wanting a home. These children are ready for adoption into Christian homes. Mrs. Ayars suggests that this is the most beautiful Christmas present any family can receive and is the most precious gift any home may make to Christ. She may be addressed by inquirers at 5881 Plymouth Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

Sketches of American Missions

The State Convention of Georgia met this year at Augusta. Howard T. Cree and wife, with the great First Church, impressed us anew with the sincerity and heartiness of southern hospitality by the extensive way in which they took the strangers in.

In "the New South" a traveler must consult his map every morning to make sure he is not in "the great and growing west." In southern Georgia there is a section of country where every old house, negro cabin, shack and pig pen is covered with red-tile roofing, such as is used in most expensive constructions in the northern cities. Just so is the new, aggressive, modern spirit changing the aspect of things in the south. Stunned by the severe blow of the war between states, impoverished by debt and hampered by most untoward and unusual social labor and political conditions and problems, this fair and favored section of our beloved country has lagged behind in the rapid pace of material progress. But things are "up and doing" now. The revised advice of Horace Greely is sane and practical and to the young man looking for opportunity and fortune we say, "Go South, young man, go South." Were this the time and place, abundant reason could be given for such advice. It is important to note that now is the time for the American Board to vigorously push its work of extension in the Southland. If we can get in "on the ground floor" in these new and growing towns, it will only be a few years until we will be a great people in "the Sunny South." Ten dollars given now is worth one hundred given ten years from now.

In Georgia we have 141 churches and 15,000 members. The policy of concentrating on the cities has given us good churches in Augusta, Atlanta, Valdosta, Athens, Winder, Sandersville, Savannah and Macon. Yet in this state there are 100 county seat towns where we have no church. Our leadership in able ministers and wise business men is good. Complete unification here obtains between the state and American Board and is most satisfactory. John H. Wood is secretary and superintendent. Strong in the hearts of the churches, approving his work, one hears repeatedly of him, "There is only one John H. Wood." Under his direction the work has developed so as to require all his time and he is urgently called to get release from his happy pastorate at Winder to give himself to "the care of all the churches."

GRANT K. LEWIS,
Augusta, Ga. Secretary.

Foreign Society Notes

The society has received a cablegram from China saying that the missionaries were safe It is not expected that any missionary will suffer in China because of the present revolution. The revolutionists are seeking to overthrow the Manchu dynasty, and not to drive out the foreigners as was the case in the time of the Boxer uprising. It may be that the missionaries will have to leave Nankin for a time, or that they have left, but in that event the probability is that they will return very soon.

Miss Stella Walker Lewis is visiting the churches in Benton and Linn Counties, Iowa. These churches are supporting her, and they are greatly pleased with her visit and report of the work done.

H. C. Saum, of Bilaspur, India, writes that all the missionaries at that station are well. He adds that the work is in pretty good, though not in a satisfactory condition. In the absence of H. A. Eicher he has had to look after four schools. This was more than he could do properly and do his other work.

Miss Rose Armbruster, of Japan, writes that the work among the women and children is increasing in interest. Mrs. McCall is giving a series of talks to mothers on the care of children. These mothers meet with Miss Armbruster twice a month for Bible teaching.

There have been six baptisms in the Central Manila district in the last ten days of August. Two new preaching places are to be opened soon. The third year class in the Bible-school in Manila recently completed an outline course on the Life of Christ. The seniors had examinations and Christian evidences the last week in August.

W. H. Hanna, of Vigan, Philippine Islands, writes that a school for girls that lasted a little more than five weeks, has just been closed in Vigan. Eleven girls from seven different places took the instruction given by Miss Siegfried, Alejandro Anunciacion and W. H. Hanna. All made notable progress in the study of the Bible, Bible geography, Sunday-school teaching and methods, music and hygiene. The young women, assisted by the young men of the Bible college, rendered two open programs in the chapel to audiences that filled the building. Two of the students who began their studies not having obeyed the gospel, were constrained very soon by the love of Christ to obey the truth. This they did with joy.

D. C. McCallum writes: "We must have an industrial department in connection with the school in Vigan. While the initial expense of this will be fairly heavy, I am sure that later with careful handling, it will become a source of income. The trade schools in connection with the public schools bring in a handsome sum. There are three good reasons for having an industrial department. First, with such a department many poor boys will be able to work their way through. In the second place, it will give young men an opportunity of learning a useful trade. The industrial inefficiency of a host of would-be clerks and government officials in the Philippine Islands is becoming alarming. In the last place, manual training will help to break down the deep seated idea of the Filipinos that no one can be a gentleman until he can live without doing manual labor. It is hard to keep our native evangelists from becoming enslaved to this false social standard.

The Foreign Society is preparing for a campaign of rallies. This campaign will last about three months. There will be two teams out. In most places there will be three services in a day, one beginning at ten a. m., one at two p. m., a banquet for men at 6:15 p. m., and an evening service at

An Enthusiastic Preparation

Our Sunday-schools are enthusiastically preparing for a great offering for American Missions on November 26. The orders for supplies and pledges of liberal support are exceeding al previous records. Hundreds of new schools are in line and it seems that never again will we be able to say that there are 6,000 schools among us that send no offering for American missions. It is especially gratifying to know how universally the schools are seeking to raise large offerings. We are going to come close to the aim "$40,000." The plan is proving popular to divide the amount to be raised among the classes, asking each to become responsible for a definite portion. "America's Need" is in its fourth edition and has surpassed any previous publication of its sort.

Our organized Sunday-school work, the enlargement of the immigration service, and general home mission interests await the results of this day's offering.

American Sunday-school Supt.

National Benevolent Association News

The general secretary is on a successful trip to the conventions in the Southern states. At the Georgia convention recently held at Augusta, the sum of $900 was subscribed for the Southern Home, now located at 299 Lee street, Atlanta.

Mrs. Lane Mitchell, 105 W. Baker Street, Atlanta, is chairman of the Admission Committee of the Southern Home. All communications relative to receiving or dismissing the children of this home should be addressed to her.

When the Southern Home located at 299 Lee street the people of the neighborhood became alarmed at the presence of an orphanage in their midst. They sent a committee of three to the board of managers to protest. After inspecting the home and having a conference with the board one of the protesters gave $5 for the home, another gave $1 for a bat and ball for the boys, and the other went away "on the fence." They came to condemn and went away to praise.

The home at Jacksonville, Ill., is in deep need. This is one of the oldest and best of our homes. It is filled with some of the choicest spirits in the church. They are deserving of a willing, generous support. There is no better or more appropriate time for aiding this home than at this Thanksgiving season.

A widow with her five children from Martinsville, Va., has been received into the Southern Home at 229 Lee St., Atlanta. They were sent by the minister of the church of which the mother is a member.

A Thanksgiving donation sent to the Havens Home would be very acceptable and appropriate. They are in need.

The annual meeting of the National Benevolent Association will be held in St. Louis at 8 o'clock p. m., November 21. All members of the association should be present on that occasion.

The association is making a fine start for its annuity fund for the new fiscal year. Its annuity bonds are growing more popular every day. JAS. H. MOHORTER.

The Gospel of the Kingdom

For Young People's and Adult Classes

The enthusiasm with which so many adult Sunday school classes have taken up the gospel of the Kingdom series this fall prompts us to present the outline of subjects for the entire year of 1912. The lessons come in the form of a monthly magazine—not quarterly, but monthly—at 50c a year. Dr. Josiah Strong is the editor of the series. Problems relating to men, women and the home are uppermost the coming year. The magazine is adapted to both men and women, whether young people or older folks. Send 5c in stamps for a single copy of the magazine.

All Ten Week Subscriptions End With This Issue

During the past ten weeks several thousand of the readers of The Christian Century have been making their first acquaintance with this newspaper. Their names were received on a short time subscription offer for this very purpose. In some cases their ten weeks' attachment was due to their own choice. In many other instances their names were sent us by friends who wished them to know what The Christian Century is, what ideals it stands for and how well it stands for these ideals.

Both editors and publishers found great satisfaction in the enthusiastic response of our regular readers last summer to our proposal to send the paper to their friends ten weeks for ten cents. The number of names received in that offer went far beyond our expectations. Such a revelation of the strength and heartiness of feeling on the part of our readers strengthened and heartened us who work at the task of making the paper.

According to the terms of our proposal it was stated that all names would be removed from the lists at the expiration of the ten weeks, unless a regular subscription was meanwhile received. This it is our purpose to do. With this issue the ten weeks' period terminates. Already a large number have sent in their subscription for a year. Their names have been transferred to the regular list. They are not "acquaintances" now, but members of the family.

The next ten weeks will bring many more. It is our experience that the best agent for The Christian Century is the paper itself. Whenever people get a taste of it they want more. A great proportion of those who have read the paper ten weeks will remain for a year and for ten years! We wish this proportion to be as large as possible. Those who send in their names and the subscription price now will not miss a single number. Remember that your subscription will be credited to Jan 1, 1913. This means an extra month free!

A New Book of Vital Religious Importance

The Divinity of Christ

By EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

The Genius of Thanksgiving Day

THIS is the genius of Thanksgiving Day: it makes optimism a civic duty. National custom issues a decree, and our President and Governors sign it, calling upon every citizen, on this day at least, to cease his wailing, to walk out into the world and count his blessings. Once a year optimism gets the whole machinery of the state and the social order behind the pessimist and shoves him out of his cave into the broad sunny world which, despite its short-comings, the Creator called good.

The pessimist is always a man who dwells in a cave. The world has contracted about him. He sees only himself and his own slim resources. It is perfectly natural that the big problems upon whose solution human welfare depends, should present a dark aspect to him; perfectly natural that he should see calamity ahead; that he should think the world growing worse and that he should pine for the good old days.

The pessimist is always an egoist; not that he thinks more highly of himself than he ought to think, for he may despise himself, but that he sees only himself or his sect or his party or his plan, in the doing of God's work in the world. "I only am left," said Elijah in his cave. All others have gone after false gods and now they seek even my life also! He despaired of God's enterprise because he was blind to any other forces save those that centered in himself and his prophetic work.

But God said, There are seven thousand others! My enterprise does not depend wholly upon you, Elijah. I am working in ways and through men that you know not of. And Elijah came out of his cave and left his tears and his doubts behind him.

This is ever the divine challenge to earnest men who are stricken with whining. Get out of your cave, stop measuring the failure of your efforts and your plan, and measure now the successes that God is achieving by others' efforts and through other plans. What God wants in His prophets and workers is that they shall discern how rich He is in resources and in men. Thanksgiving day is the day to count the seven thousand who work with us, whom we have ignored, whose names and creeds and party alignments are not our own, but whose energies serve the good kingdom of God.

The reformer should come out of his cave on this Thanksgiving day. He is peculiarly tempted to pessimism. He sees the woeful wrongs which society tolerates. He pioneers a program of reform. He builds a party about him. Soon disillusionment settles upon his soul. The world is indifferent to his pleading. His party grows so far and no farther. His plan is ineffectual. Reform wins today, and tomorrow loses what it had won. Men seem embedded in their own interests and have no passion for social righteousness.

How many a reformer has carried this experience of defeat into a cave thick with the dank air of pessimism! And there he nurses his sore heart, finding a certain cynical comfort in the fact that the indifference of all others makes his own lonely valor all the more distinctive!

But, reformer, it is Thanksgiving Day! What doest thou here in thy cave? Up, walk out! God has other forces working for prohibition besides thy party, for social justice besides thy movement, for human welfare besides thy charity. Unseen, unknown to thee, unintended often by themselves, men and forces are at work in the divine enterprise of the kingdom of God.

A signal instance of the uncounted forces that work for a better world is shown in the temperance movement. Five years ago when reformers were never more depressed, it became suddenly apparent that the economic and industrial interests of society had awakened to the bearing of the liquor curse upon business efficiency. The output of mill and factory was cut down by the drink habit. Railroads had taken the lead in demanding sobriety of engineers and conductors of trains. The relation of drink to the negro problem in the south became clear. A wave of prohibition has been sweeping over the land ever since. Thus while men were making a direct frontal attack upon the moral conscience of the nation, and seeming to fail, God was executing a flank movement, and is executing it, to the confusion of his enemies. Come out of your cave, reformer, and use this Thanksgiving Day to count these unreckoned forces that are with you!

There is a plaintive strain in the speech of churchmen today. The churches are but half-filled. The ministry is declining. The old-fashioned revival is futile. Skepticism flourishes. Men have no time to pray. This is the subject matter of much Christian conversation.

Many a prayer meeting is a cave wherein Elijah has gone. From out its stilly depths a doleful sound proceeds, as from a tomb, and says, "They have broken down thine altars, Lord. The people care no more for Thee and thy church. They rush unheeding past its portal. We only are left, and they treat us with scorn."

Then the voice of God: What doest thou here Elijah? Come out of your prayer-meeting cave, out of your sectarian cave, out of your doctrinal cave, your peculiar-kind-of-religion cave—come out into the big world where men face each other and clasp hands and work and give money and pray. I have measureless forces in the social order working for My kingdom, beside you, Elijah. Forces and ideals in school and book and magazine and gymnasium and social settlement and Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. and charity organization and labor organization and child welfare movement and woman's advance movement and Men and Religion forward movement—seven thousand enterprises that are on your side, O church!

Can a soul feel the throbbing pulse of humanity today and be pessimistic? The bosom of the race, heathen and Christian, heaves with new moral emotion. The inertia of the church in the presence of its problem is not palsy. Its arm is not a withered arm. It is but dazed for the moment with the sense of what it means to be a Christian church in the midst of social forces which have taken so much of its work off its hands.

Thanksgving Day calls for the self-centered church to come out of its cave, to leave off whining, to make glad inventory of God's other forces that work with it, and to gird itself afresh with the power of Christ for its own inalienable task.

Social Survey

An Endowed Philanthropic Corporation

In these days of commercial monopolies, when great combines control almost everything that can be thought of, is it any wonder that some of our great multi-millionaires who have "got the habit" should seek to establish a monopoly in benevolence? The competition is so strong that none have been successful though the sums they have given are written with many figures. But a few have come near enough that goal to establish benevolent corporations, and the latest organization of this kind is the Carnegie Corporation of New York. This was organized on Nov. 10, by Andrew Carnegie and by him endowed with $25,000,000 in the form of 5 per cent first mortgages, intended to be used for the founding and aiding of libraries, schools, and other educational institutions. Mr. Carnegie, who will soon be seventy-seven years of age, has given more than $200,000,000 to benevolence. With advancing years he is anxious that his wealth shall continue to serve the people, while realizing that younger and more able hands must soon assume the responsibility of directing it into deserving channels. With this object, then, the new organization has been created with the following directors: President, Andrew Carnegie; vice president, Elihu Root; treasurer, Robert A. Franks; secretary, James Bertram; Henry S. Pritchett, William N. Frew, Robert S. Woodward, Charles L. Taylor, and their successors. This philanthropic institution is in possession of a fund probably greater than that commanded by any other like body in the world, and it will constitute a permanent treasure-house for the relief of struggling educational institutions.

Wu Ting Fang on the Chinese Republic

To the man on the street who attempts to draw a daylight picture of the Chinese situation by reading the newspaper reports, the revolution seems most chaotic and disorganized. The complicated story of the struggle in a country with a larger area than the United States and with four times as many people, the map of which is punctuated with oriental names whose chief distinguishing feature is that each looks less pronounceable than the others, is regarded with mingled curiosity and incomprehension. Recent events will form one of the great pages in the history of China. The revolutionists have been remarkably successful, but the people seem hardly ready for a complete democratic government. The following appeal signed by Wu Ting Fang, the new director of foreign affairs in China, breathes the budding hopes of the new republic. It is transmitted to the civilized world as from "one who is a steadfast lover of liberty, who is ever courageously fighting the battle of the oppressed." Here is the appeal:

"The Chinese nation, born anew in the travail of revolution, extends friendly greetings and felicitations to the whole world. The republic of China now asks such recognition by the civilized powers as will enable it, with the assistance of their kindly offices, to erect upon the foundation of honest government and friendly trade and intercourse with all peoples a peaceful, happy future. The Chinese people are not untried in self-government. For countless ages they ruled themselves and developed an observance of the law to a degree not known among other races. They developed the arts, industries and agriculture and knew peace and contentment surpassingly sweet. Down upon them swept the savage hordes of an alien, warlike race. The Chinese people were conquered and enslaved. For 270 years this bondage existed. Then the Chinese people arose and struck this blow for freedom. Out of the chaos and dust of the falling throne emerges a free, enlightened people, a great natural democracy of 400,000,000 human beings. They have chosen to set up a republic. Their choice we believe a wise one. No class nobility among the Chinese, no recognized royal family to set up in place of the departing Manchu royal house. This is a great democracy. Officials spring from among the people and to the people will return. No princes, lords or dukes among the Chinese. With the Manchu throne removed there is left a made-to-order republic. Already we have provincial assemblies and a national assembly. Already we have a republic with a full set of competent officials. Within a few days the constitutional convention will meet. Arrangements for it were made long ago. At the convention will be fully authorized delegates from every province. A constitution of the most enlightened character will be adopted and new officers of the provisional government elected. Following will come, under the provisions of the constitution, provincial national elections. It is imperative that our government be recognized at this time in order that business may not be subjected to prolonged stagnation. Peace prevails everywhere save at Hankow, but business cannot proceed until the new republic is welcomed among the nations of the world. We ask recognition that we may enter upon new life and new relationship with the great powers. We ask recognition of the republic because the republic is a fact. Fourteen of the eighteen provinces have declared independence of the Manchu government and promulgated allegiance to the republic. The remaining provinces will, it is expected, soon take the same course. The Manchu dynasty finds its power fallen away. Its glitter of yesteray becomes a puppet show. Before going it stripped itself of all authority by consenting to the terms of the proposed constitution already made public. The most glorious page in Chinese history has been written with a bloodless pen."

Mr. Roosevelt on Regulation of Trusts

In an editorial which appears in the Outlook for Nov. 18, Mr. Roosevelt considers the trust problem and the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the oil and tobacco trust cases with a candor, vigor and clearness characteristic of the man. His first concern is to defend his own position, taken when president of the United States, in permitting the acquisition by the Steel Corporation of the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company. He resents the statement that he had been misled in the results of this consolidation, and presents evidence to show that by this acquisition the Steel Corporation did not control over one-fifth of the iron ore in the South, and that following the acquisition of this company, the percentage of the nation's total production of steel ingots and steel castings made by the Steel Corporation steadily decreased from 66 in 1901 to 54.3 in 1910. Mr. Roosevelt contends that the Sherman anti-trust law is inadequate. Congress has failed to legislate to remedy an evil which, he says, imperatively needed regulation. The supreme court recognized this imperative need and attempted to remedy it. The editorial says: "It is contended that in these recent decisions the Supreme Court legislated; so it did; and it had to; because congress had signally failed to do its duty by legislating. . . . Where the legislative body persistently leaves open a field which it is absolutely imperative, from the public standpoint, to fill, then no possible blame attaches to the official or officials who step in because they have to. . . ." But the effect of the decision of the supreme court is not good. It leaves the nation without a fixed policy, groping, as it were, in the dark. "The present situation is not satisfactory and cannot be put on a permanently satisfactory basis unless we put an end to the period of groping and declare for a fixed policy, a policy which shall clearly define and punish wrong-doing. . ." Mr. Roosevelt emphatically insists that size alone does not constitute a crime, but only a potential menace which should be properly regulated to prevent its possibilities from being wrongly taken advantage of. He considers that it is foolish to attempt to restore business to the competitive basis by strengthening the anti-trust law. "Any such effort is foredoomed to end in failure, and, if successful, would be mischievous to the last degree. . . . The effort to restore competition as it was sixty years ago, and to trust for justice solely to this proposed restoration of competition, is just as foolish as if we should go back to the flint-locks of Washington's Continentals as a substitute for modern weapons of precision." On the other hand he says: "The effort to administer a law merely by lawsuits and court decisions is bound to end in signal failure, and meanwhile to be attended with delays and uncertainties, and to put a premium upon legal sharp practice. Such an effort does not adequately punish the guilty, and yet works great harm to the innocent." In summing up he says: "We need to formulate immediately and definitely a policy which, in dealing with big corporations which behave themselves and which contain no menace save what is necessarily potential in any corporation which is of great size and very well managed, shall aim not at their destruction but at their regulation and supervision, so that the government shall control them in such fashion as amply to safeguard the interests of the whole public, including producers, consumers, and wage-workers. . . . The law should be clear, unambiguous, certain, so that honest men may not find that unwittingly they have violated it. . . . Competition will remain as a very important factor when once we have destroyed the unfair business methods, the criminal interference with the rights of others, which alone enable certain swollen combinations to crush out their competitors."

I know not how it is. I know not all the law. I am only sure of this: the fight that each man fights behind his chamber door for courage and for patience and for faith, he fights not for himself alone, he fights for all mankind; he fights as one who is a helper of his kind, as a blood brother of that One who in little Galilee, obscure, almost alone, was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities, and Who upon the cross became the Burden-bearer of the human race.—Selected.

The Advantage of a Short Service

There are many signs that the city populations of today want to take their religious pabulum in the same rush that they do their lunch. The demand "make it short" is often heard at weddings and to our shame be it said, sometimes at funerals. Business men are to be found who would have the church hold a twenty minute service on Sunday morning. The preachers who never know where the logical end of a discourse is, are to be blamed of course. We think, however, that the problem of effective work in the pulpit is one of dealing with vital truth. No one ever told Doctor Grenfell, or Doctor Jowett, to "make it short." We always complain that it is not long enough. People sit in theaters under good acting for two hours and do not complain of long lectures. Hence we feel that the clipping from the Northwestern Christian Advocate is only a partial truth:

Let me tell you what some people are saying about long prayers, long sermons, long introductory exercises in church services. Mark Twain says: "I went to church one time and was so impressed by what the preacher told me about the poor heathen that I was ready to give up a hundred dollars of my own money, and even to go out and borrow more to send to the heathen. But the minister preached too long and my own enthusiasm began to drop, about twenty-five dollars a drop, till there was nothing left for the poor heathen, and, by the time he was through and the collection was taken up I stole ten cents off the plate."

A certain pastor in New England once said to Bishop Mallalieu: "I usually preach sermons of about thirty minutes' length, but recently I got so interested in my subject that I preached for fifty-five minutes. I apologized to my audience for preaching so long. At the close of the service, a good brother told me if I would preach as well as I did then, I might always preach as long." The bishop laid his hand on the pastor's shoulder and kindly said: "Do not let them fool you, brother. Thirty minutes is long enough—don't preach any longer."

Rev. W. E. Barton, in the Chicago Advance, says of Doctor Aked's preaching: "He preaches too long. He goes into unnecessary detail in some of his illustrations. He expands some of his introductions needlessly. He weakens the force of some of his best periods by a habit he has of leaning his elbow on the pulpit and his chin on his hand." The writer, however, complimented Doctor Aked's brilliant power of oratory, the literary beauty of his productions, and the fact that he preached without notes.

It is well known that many ministerial orators have nearly ruined their career owing to the lack of "terminal facilities." If many sermons could be eliminated at both ends and reduced in the middle, they would produce greater results. Audiences are willing to excuse bishops whom they expect to hear only once in a lifetime, and elderly clergymen who find it difficult to abbreviate old sermons, preached at times when people brought their lunches to church in order to remain for the afternoon services. Would it not be better if sixty-minute sermons, fifteen-minute public prayers, ten-minute notices, long readings, and musical numbers could be divided and come in on the limited?

Christian Connection

Still Fighting Evolution

It is to be deplored that religious workers still fight the acceptance of the evolutionary hypothesis and insist that it is a subtle form of infidelity, when every book of science of recent times builds upon it. Even the polemical preacher who loudly announces the death of evolution has his children studying from that point of view in his village high school. The church has nothing to gain fighting Galileos. Let it cease to claim to be an authority in nature science, as the scientist should in like manner be modest concerning the things of the spirit. The following appeared in the Herald of Gospel Liberty:

As to the "evoluntionary hypothesis," whatever it may be considered in the province of science—though even there not a few of its advocates confess that it is an "unproven theory," and at best only a "working hypothesis"—in the department of history, and especially of religion, we regard it as not only unproven, but as very misleading and dangerous. If there be anything inseparable from Bible teaching, there are two great positions without which biblical history and theology fall into chaos: one is that the human race began on a comparatively high level and sank to a lower in the fall of man through sin; and, second, that in Jesus Christ we have a perfect man—the God-man—not a product of evolution, or a sort of exceptional freak of nature in giving us, in advance, a kind of anticipation of the final product, but a divinely-perfect humanity due to a vital union of the Spirit of God with the seed of the woman.

Presbyterian

An Elder Asserts Himself

Those churches which have the eldership, especially the ruling eldership such as is found among Presbyterians and Disciples, are familiar with the plaint of these officers that their power and authority is waning. They think the times are out of joint. Instead, they have ceased to function. Many of them regard themselves as the official critics of the preacher, of the self-appointed guardian of the orthodoxy of the congregation. If they are held in scant honor, it is because they do little genuinely religious work in reaching lost souls. If they seek honor, let it be by the Master's way. "He that would be great among you, let him be the servant of you all." We quote a plaint from a Presbyterian elder in the Presbyterian Advance:

The Presbyterian Church is republican in its form of government, but, in fact, it has become not a republic but an oligarchy, and the ruling class in our church today is the ministry. If you doubt this watch your presbytery and see that the preachers propose the legislation and direct practically every action taken. Go to your General Assembly and there see a comparatively small number of preachers directing its affairs as absolutely as ever a political leader ruled his party. Yet the eldership equals the ministry in your Assembly and the elders outnumber the preachers in your presbytery. Then why this preacher-rule in the church, and why political bossism in the state? Do not look in the ministry and in the halls of Congress for the answers; look nearer home—look within yourself. Each of us is an answer, and all of us are the answer to these two questions.

Professional Evangelism Becoming an Offense

The Presbyterian church has ceased to maintain its support of certain kinds of professional evangelism, and the journals of that denomination are protesting against the lack of reverence and genuine religious spirit among some representatives of this class of religious workers. One of the commonest passions of the evangelists is that of accumulating statistics. The Continent remarks thus upon this matter:

Rev. William A. Sunday, a Presbyterian minister, has done a vast amount of preaching as an evangelist and, by all reports, has done good that can never be estimated. His methods are his own and reach audiences that no other man of our present day can reach. He is orthodox to the core, and eloquent, mightily eloquent, in his preaching. He has himself reaped pecuniary benefit that causes some to scoff and gibe. With his success as a soul-winner we are delighted; for his frugality that has placed him beyond want we have no condemnation; but against his bald financial exhibition of the relative cost of saving souls in Chicago, New York, Boston and elsewhere we protest. The mathematical demonstration that to save a soul in Boston costs, as Mr. Sunday asserts, $405, is a travesty of the dearest, holiest thing possible to human thought which we shiver to contemplate.

Professional evangelism is fast becoming an offense. Let an evangelistic work begin in any large city, let the placards be big enough and black and red enough, let the machinery be elaborate enough, let the power of the singer and his chorus be great enough and the audiences will pack the auditorium. The overwrought souls that can be carried off, or better, up upon their feet, will rise and throng the altar spaces by the platform. The personal workers will go hustling here and there, speaking effusive words in ignorance of the wants or circumstances of those to whom they speak, and next morning in great headlines the daily journals will report, "Doctor Peter and Doctor John took twenty-five sinners in the dragnet last night. Twenty-five more souls delivered from the devil"—and other legends of similar import. As a fact neither Doctor Peter nor Doctor John has ever delivered one single soul from the devil, and souls are not saved by the netful caught like herring in shoals.

Church of Christ

Mission Work Without a Society

Among the Disciples of Christ are a remnant who still oppose the organization of missionary societies on the ground of unscripturalness. These have never been noted for missionary liberality and have but small part in carrying the gospel to the uttermost parts of the world under our Great Commission. A writer indulges in the following fond dream, which of course under their system is rather an impossible one. We quote from the Gospel Advocate, an organ of these non-coöperating Disciples:

There are twenty-eight churches in the county—more than any other county in the state probably, except Davidson, which includes Nashville. The prospective brother is a married man with two children. He should have about twelve hundred dollars a year. If all the twenty-eight churches will co-operate, it will require on an average only three dollars and fifty-seven cents a month per church to raise the amount. If only ten members in each church will give thirty-six cents, this will make the amount. If fifteen members will give, each need give only twenty-four cents a month. If thirty members take part, they need give only twelve cents a month in order for the twenty-eight churches to raise the twelve dollars. Surely, then, the task is an easy one.

Has the Church Outlived its Usefuness?

It is significant that the question of the usefulness of the church should be considered in the prayer meeting. Some persons take it for granted that the church is a necessary institution. They doubt the sanity or honesty of any who say it is no longer needed. They are satisfied with it as it is. Others have fully made up their minds that the church is an outgrown institution. They advise young men of ability to keep out of the ministry. There are many in the church who feel that the world could not carry on its business properly without the aid of the church and who nevertheless have very hazy notions as to the particular service the church ought to render. In the interest of clear thinking it is necessary to face honestly the question of the church's right to exist.

The intelligent critic of the church does not demand that all its members be leaders in political and social reform. He knows that the church must take men as it finds them and employ them in the kind of work for which they are fitted. Progress in the church is made possible by the vision and energy of the few. The intelligent and honest critic tries to understand the mind of the leaders of today and he listens to the new voices that are likely to command in the activities of tomorrow. There are many kinds of people to whom the church must minister. The critic is under obligation to have a good deal of information about the needs of the peoples of the earth before he announces the failure of the church.

The Laymen's Missionary Campaign was a revelation of what the church of America is doing and prophecy of what it will do. It was revealed that a great host of strong men have been giving time and money for the evangelization of the world. It was also made clear that much power hitherto unused could esaily be turned into the channels of missionary service. At the World's Missionary Conference men had a chance to see what an enormous amount of work is now being done for the Christianization of the world. The task which the church has set itself appealed to scholars, statesmen, soldiers, and men of business. Those who were at Edinburgh do not raise the question of the right of the church to the loyalty of the wisest and best of the sons of men. Their problem is to secure for the church the support it needs for its missions in all parts of the world.

The Men and Religion Forward Movement is another revelation of the power of organized religion. There are 3,000,000 more girls and women in the churches of North America than boys and men. The leaders of this forward movement decline to accept the explanation that women are more religious than men. They prefer to believe that the church can win the men if it goes after them in the right way. They point to the fact that where men are invited to express their convictions in activities suited to them they have been ready to hear the gospel message. And it is a full gospel that is being preached to the men of America. They are being asked to be loyal to the home, the church, the school, the state. They are learning that boys are more important than money, that it is the first business of the men of America to be examples of faith, purity, moral courage, and generosity.

The Sunday-school is demonstrating its usefulness as a builder of character. One of our magazine writers tells us there is an insurgent Sunday-school. Old ways of teaching are passing away. The social message of the prophets has been discovered and it is increasing interest in religion and the church. For many years the student of the Bible has been able to get, for a small sum, the aid of experts in biblical study. Now the expert in social service is coming to the assistance of the teacher of religion. He is showing how the gospel of grace can be applied to the conditions of the present. It is possible to discuss in the Sunday-school class all the questions relating to the welfare of the nation without exciting partisan feeling. The reason is that we have ceased to look to politicians for guidance. We have reached the stage of scientific investigation. The opportunity of the religious teacher was never greater. He is answering with an emphatic negative those who confidently announce that the church is a waning institution. Equipped with a knowledge of man and of religion, he is engaged in an indispensible ministry. The world knows it needs him and that he represents the church. [Midweek Service, Dec. 6. Matt. 5:1-16.]

IX—THE SOCIOLOGY OF BAPTISM.

In the preceding chapter we considered the magical and the legalistic forms of the baptism dogma, affirming that one was as fictitious as the other, and suggesting that only in a sociological view would our thought be saved from exaggeration and unreality. Baptism is a function of the social organ of religion—the church; it is not an independent, isolated institution, with a meaning inherent in itself. Its whole meaning is derived from the church in whose organized activity it performs a particular service. It is proper to speak of it as an institution at all only if one keeps in mind this its auxiliary character. We must go on now to consider this sociological explanation of baptism, giving our warrant for regarding the ordinance from such a point of view and setting forth certain of its implications.

We are justified in taking baptism out of magical and legalistic classifications and interpreting it in sociological terms because the church itself is a social institution and interpretable therefore in sociological terms. Whatever else is to be said about the church—and much else is to be said—it will hardly be denied that it is a social institution, standing side by side in the social order with other institutions—the state, the home, the school. That is to say, the church can give account of itself in terms of the social habits and forces of mankind, just as the home and the state can give similar accounts of themselves. Each arose out of human need, and was constructed of materials that were at hand. Each has undergone evolution. Each acts and interacts upon its environment. None is more supernatural in its origin than the others, nor is its form more infallibly determined.

It seems hardly necessary to state these things. But the church has so long been considered a sort of importation into the social order instead of a construction within the social order by forces and habits which lie back of all institutional phenomena, that it is necessary to reaffirm the social point of view again and again.

The whole system of dogmas with which the church has been overgrown are made possible by the church's blindness to this basic and obvious fact. Every form of sacerdotalism, sacramentarianism, magic and legalism roots itself in the uncritical fiction that the church came into being ab extra. And every dogma that limits divine grace to exclusive channels, such as the historic episcopate or the holy communion or the baptismal water, dissolves into pure unreality once it is seen that the church is a social institution with a human history, and that its rites and ordinances and organization have been determined by essentially the same social facts and forces that determine any institution.

Nothing is more obvious to the mind unprepossessed by traditional dogmas than the fact that the Christian church grew from within the social order of the first Christian century. It was not super-imposed upon the social order. It was not miraculously let down from heaven. No supernatural foreordination entered into its making. Moved by the strong social forces which Christ's newly imparted life had released in their souls the early Christians drew together for fellowship and for power. They needed no external divine command to thus draw together in a communal association. The establishment of an order, a freemasonry of the religious life, that is to say, a church, was humanly inevitable. Inner, natural, social forces are perfectly adequate to account for the forming of the church without drawing upon miraculous or mandatory sanctions of any sort. The church found its authority for existence not in any thin legalistic decree, but in the eternal spiritual life which the indwelling Christ was imparting to the souls of his followers. Upon this fact, a divine fact and an out-and-out human fact, the church was built. This is its impregnable foundation; other foundation can no man lay.

The particular forms of their community life were not arbitrarily determined for these early Christians. They drew together under the forms to which for the most part they were accustomed. Nor were they infallibly guided by miraculous interventon of the divine will. There is no warrant whatever for the assumption that the direction of the Holy Spirit to which on accasion they referred was miraculous. Guided by the Holy Spirit, they constructed the church, as was most natural, from materials with which they were familiar in synagogue and temple. That their selection of materials was not always infallibly correct is disclosed in the sharp differences later arising between Jewish Christians who were accustomed to certain rites and the Gentile converts who were not accustomed to them. This clash of diverse social and religious customs was the divine way of winnowing the materials which naturally belonged to the spiritual life of the growing church from those that did not belong to it. Had not Gentile social customs come into the reckoning circumcision and many ceremonial regulations would have become as much a part of historic Christianity as baptism and the Lord's Supper.

And even in the Lord's Supper there is registered the mark of this same clash of custom. At the first this rite was an integral part of an actual meal, celebrated just as on the Passover night when Jesus had first suggested it. Jewish habits and temper were such as to have so perpetuated it. But Gentiles had no social traditions enabling them to make a religious sacrament of a common meal. They could not celebrate this, therefore, without gluttony and revelry. The simple holy love-feast became a scandal. To save the sacramental element at all a distinction came to be made between the Love-feast and the Eucharist. The former gathered into itself the human fellowship and the latter the divine communion, quite abstracted from the warm simplicity of the human situation in which it had first arisen. It was not long until the Eucharist was invested with magic, and even the mock food and drink transformed into the actual body and blood of Christ.

Had it not been for the working of these elemental human social forces within the institution of the Lord's Supper we might now be observing it not as a mere symbol of a meal, a make-believe meal, but in the primitive Christian way as a feast of actual food and drink sanctified by the sacramental purposes of fellowship and worship.

In the case of baptism, the initiating ceremony into the Christian community, there was at the first no clash between the customs of the two sections of the church. The rite seemed equally appropriate to both Jews and Gentiles. Immersion, as we have seen, was the commonly accepted form of conferring Jewish citizenship upon a Gentile proselyte. It had therefore naturally come to be the form of solemnizing an initiation into a new religious order. It was its very customariness that made it of value to John. Had he invented some novel symbol of his own, his moral purpose would have been eclipsed by the people's questions and his own explanations of the external act. Had he asseverated that the physical act which the people were exhorted to obey was appointed of God, he would yet more surely have drawn their minds away from the repentance which he enjoined and the new order of righteousness which he endeavored to establish. He would thus have been not the herald of the Messiah, but a true successor of the pharisees.

John therefore had chosen an objective act about which there would be no questions asked, and for which no explanations nor supernatural sanctions would be necessary, and had placed his whole emphasis upon the moral message he was commissioned to declare. As respects the symbol of initiation into his new order, therefore, John had followed the line of least resistance, which was the line of social custom.

In like manner the early church, beginning among Jews, followed the natural line of social custom, the line of least resistance. With the new life surging in their souls they were in no mood to invent a new form of initiation, nor to argue with any man that one form was better than another, nor to claim the authority of their Lord for one form above another. They, too, would have eclipsed their essential message had they found themselves making a physical act coördinate with the faith and repentance and forgiveness which they experienced and preached. They practiced immersion because it was the thing at hand. It was not Christianity's contribution to society. It was society's contribution to Christianity.

And when Christianity invaded the Gentile world, the Jewish custom of initiating converts by immersion in water did not clash with a diverse custom of the Gentiles, or a lack of similar custom, as in he case of the Levitical regulations, circumcision and the Lord's Supper. On the contrary, it found immersion quite as indigenous among Greeks and Romans as among Jews. No social adjustment was necessary here. No explanations were called for as to the superiority of one physical act over another. No apostle was compelled to drag in the authority of Christ to make immersion acceptable. The act was taken for granted. The authority of Christ was not used up on insubstantial matters of external form but kept for the weighty matters of righteousness, mercy and faith.

Thus we see the almost incidental origin of the physical act of immersion as it became related to the primitive church. It took its place in the intitiating ceremony of the Christian order because it had occupied a similar place in initiatory ceremonies of other religious orders to which Jews were accustomed. It was a natural not a novel thing for the early church to do. Its basis was in social custom, not in legal mandate.

So much for the social history of baptism in the early church. We shall return to certain aspects of this history in later articles, but we shall pass now to inquire concerning the social function of baptism in religious organization.

Why did the early church baptize at all? And why does the church today baptize? Is not baptism incongruous with an ethical, a spiritual religion? Such a question as this last, asked today by so many, has its origin in the conception of baptism as an abstract institution, assumed to possess intrinsic virtue of a magical or legalistic character.

Minds that are working close to reality in our day are impatient of all institutions that do not link themselves actually with concrete human life and justify their existence by their function in human life. Such minds cannot think in the categories of magic or sacramentarianism or legalism. They regard all institutions which find no terms in which to justify their existence save these categories as not simply superfluous but harmful cumberers of the ground. Baptism, many such persons feel, is such an institution.

This impatience with baptism is due to the fact that the conventional apologetic for it is more or less magical or wholly legalistic. The unethical character of this apologetic is apparent to most earnest minds who think through to its implications. But the sociological interpretation gives baptism an entirely different setting. It connects the ordinance dynamically with human life and gives it an actual service to render.

If we are to have a church at all, a distinct social institution taking its place in the social order beside other institutions, baptism follows. The organization of religion upon a voluntary principle, for fellowship, worship and service, makes baptism necessary. There can be no church, in our Christian, democratic sense of the term, without baptism. Abolish baptism and you abolish the church. For baptism is the church defining itself. The ordinance marks the line between the church and the world.

That a social institution is necessary for the nourishment of spiritual religion and as a means of rendering its moral program effective in the world, is assumed in these articles. It is both inevitable as a result of the social impulse of those who are of like mind concerning Christ, and prudential as a result of rational reflection upon the best means of bringing in the kingdom of God. All the forces that draw men together in political parties, in lodges, in labor unions, in scientific societies, in guilds, in clubs, in fraternities, in every kind of common bond, operate with more resistless power to draw them together on the basis of common religion.

The principle of freemasonry with which our whole life is shot through, finds its deepest interpretation in the church. Here men are bound by the freemasonry of the spirit. It is not wealth, nor common craft, nor common intellectual pursuits, nor any adventitious thing whatsoever that binds them. In the church, ideally, men truly meet on the level, the deep level of spiritual manhood—there is neither Jew nor Greek, male nor female, barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but all are one in Christ Jesus. This absolute democracy of the church is its chiefest human glory.

Democratic as it is, heterogeneous in its composition, the church needs some act by which it may register in its corporate mind and in the soul of each member, the reality of this communal life.

Each recruit must be made to feel that he belongs, that he has rights and privileges in the spiritual community. He must, in a word, be made to feel at home. This sense of fellowship, of actually being a part of the social entity, is created by formal initiation—baptism. The welcome of individual members does not suffice,—although without it the formal initiation is hollow. There must be a corporate act, representatively performed, in which the social will of the group meets the will of the individual and confers upon him the new status. This is what every initiatory act does —in the state, in marriage, in lodge and guild. In the church this act is sacramental, and justly so, because the freemasonry into which it introduces one is religious.

But the iniatory rite is solemnized not alone for the sake of adjusting the individual comfortably to the new social group, but to give the group authority over the individual. Initiation, baptism, is a means of social control. The ideals of the Christian community are defined in the soul of the initiate as obligations henceforth. The time of indecision is past. Freedom to do or not to do is no more. The individual has now been put in a position where he must feel the strong stimulus of the social will into which he has merged his own. Its judgments are registered in his conscience to confirm or to condemn his acts.

We shall take up our study at this point next week.

The Congress of Disciples and Baptists

For some twenty years the Baptist denomination has held an annual congress. For about half that period the Disciples have met in a similar gathering. Three years ago a joint congress was held between the two bodies, to which the Free Baptists were also invited. This triangular conference was held in Memorial Church of Christ, in this city, a church which at that time had a history of but six months as a union congregation of Baptists and Disciples.

At that time it was arranged that while the annual congresses of both denominations should continue as separate gatherings they should be held together once in three years, at least for a time. The second of these triennial meetings was held at Atlantic City, November 14-16 in the First Baptist Church. The Free Baptists were as before a part of the gathering but now their relations are much more intimate with the regular Baptists than they were three years ago. Steps which were at that time under way toward the union of the two bodies have now been practically consummated, and the missionary agencies of Baptists and Free Baptists are one.

The proportion of ministers and teachers who attend the congresses both among Baptists and Disciples is not large. Men are much more likely to be attracted by the organized interests which report at the national conventions of the two bodies. Yet many of the most important men are to be found at these gatherings, and the programmes are always of a high order. Doctor Gessler, the honored secretary of the Baptist Congress, has wrought efficiently through many years to make the Baptist gatherings a success, and his work is recognized with gratitude. It would be well if the Disciples also would select some competent man who could continue in the office of secretary of the congress, thus avoiding the loss resulting from the constant shifting of responsibilities.

Atlantic City is not a central place for either denomination, and this probably affected the attendance; but it is a city of remarkable interest. It is literally builded upon the sand, but its climate is so equable and its attractions so numerous that great numbers of people make it a place of resort at every season of the year.

The sessions were devoted to such themes as, "In What Sense is Christ Divine?", "What are the assured results of Biblical Criticism?", "What hinders the union of Baptists and Disciples?", "Immersionists and Church Union," "Pauperism, its Causes and Cure," and "The Mystical Element in Christianity,—what is it and what is its value?" These themes were discussed in a thoroughly scholarly and adequate manner. The papers were equal to the occasion and the speeches and discussions were timely and representative.

It was a serious misfortune that several of the Disciples who had accepted places on the program were unable to be present. Dr. W. B. Craig left New York for California in the interval between the arrangement of the program and the date of the congress. President Kershner of Milligan College accepted the presidency of Texas Christian University during the same interval. I. J. Spencer of Lexington wired that he was unable to attend by reason of illness; and S. T. Willis who was to read Doctor Craig's paper failed to appear. These absences and the fact that other men within reaching distance of the congress failed to come produced an unfortunate impression upon the minds of those who had the program in charge, as if the Disciples hardly appreciated at its full value the cordial invitation they had received to be guests and participants in the gathering. On the other hand those who were there, especially Doctor Ainslie, Professor Lichtenberger, and Rev. L. E. Sellers, made up to a considerable extent for the absentees.

Perhaps the most interesting sessions were those devoted to Biblical Criticism, the union of Baptists and Disciples, and the relation of immersionists to church union. Three of the speakers on Biblical Criticism, Rev. Philip L. Jones of Philadelphia, Rev. John R. Brown of Bridgeport, Conn., and Professor Herbert L. Willett of Chicago, took strong ground in maintaining not only the necessity but the great value of critical studies as aids to faith. Dr. B. D. Hahn of Springfield, Mass., spoke on the conservative side, his paper consisting chiefly of a series of references to details in which critical scholars had not reached agreement.

Doctor Ainslie read an admirable paper on the promise of union between Baptists and Disciples. Professor McIntosh of Yale University dealt, with fine critical analysis, with the dominant elements of psychology in the two denominations, which would certainly have to be reckoned with in any plan of union. He pointed out the fact that the dominant note in the historic Baptist testimony was that of a regenerate church membership, while the Disciple's appeal to the written Word was too frequently the occasion of a legalistic attitude of mind which went far to render cordial understanding between the two bodies difficult. Professor W. J. McGlothlin of Louisville made a careful summary of Alexander Campbell's chief points of emphasis, and insisted that most of the qualities which had made the Disciples an impossible element in the problem of union, particularly in the South, were the results of Mr. Campbell's personal attitude of mind toward the Christian forces of his day. It was unfortunate that Doctor Spencer could not be present to take his part in this interesting discussion, but others of the Disciples did so, and at the close the feeling seemed deepened that union between the two bodies is inevitable, though perhaps not imminent.

Perhaps the most significant session was that devoted to "Immersionists and Church Union." The three Baptist speakers affirmed in the strongest possible manner their belief that immersion must not be allowed for a moment to stand in the way of the union which the church so greatly desires. With a frankness that would have been astonishing five years ago they admitted the entirely subordinate value of immersion, while, at the same time, affirming their personal and denominational adherence to the practice. Mr. Sellers, representing the Disciples, was somewhat more conservative, but admitted that the question of recognizing the unimmersed as in all regards brethren in the faith was pressing for a just solution. Some of the Baptists present expressed their surprise that representatives of their denomination were willing to take the aggressive ground expressed in the papers and speeches. But the general current of sentiment seemed to be that this attitude, which is practically that of the English Baptists, is the only consistent and satisfying one. The discussion was particularly interesting in the light of recent surveys of the problem in the columns of The Christian Century.

Professor Lichtenberger of the University of Pennsylvania and Dr. Addison Moore of New York contributed informing and inspiring papers on the theme of "Pauperism, its Causes and Cure." And the discussion showed clearly the deep interest which the present generation of ministers is taking in the social application of Christianity.

The last session was devoted to the mystical element in Christianity, and perhaps at this point the craving of the two denominations both for clear thinking and for urgency of spirit in the quest of character and the divine friendship was made clear. On this high level, which is the summit of New Testament thinking, denominational differences seemed very trivial, and the cry of the heart for fellowship with God and with those who are of the divine family becomes the chief demand of the religious life.

The fellowship of the congress was delightful. The welcome accorded the Disciples was generous, and there was every disposition manifested to include them in future plans. It is clear, however, that a greater responsibility must be assumed by the Disciples in securing adequate attendance at these sessions. It is scarcely just to our Baptist brethren to expect them to devote so large a part of the time set apart for these sessions to those who do not appear to appreciate the courtesy at its true worth. But it is hoped that this seeming indifference may be overcome in the future, particularly when the congress is brought to a more accessible point.

Thanksgiving in My Parish

The story is told of a lion which refused to attack in the arena a gladiator who had once bound his wound when hurt in the jungle. This is a striking instance of the gratitude so often found in the lower animals. Who has not marvelled at the slavish thankfulness of a dog? The heart of the universe is dimly adumbrated in the beginnings of its vast processes of love. But it is in man that the high grace of gratitude becomes grandly inspiring and awesome. Of all known beings it is only the human that can look forward and sigh or hope, look within and despair or approve, and only the human that can look up and worship.

None but man can conceive the Infinite, and therefore he alone can give thanks to the God that's back of all blessings. None can suffer like unto our kind. So delicate are we that we are distraught over the far reaches of our imaginations, and the low whisperings of our hearts. We alone are measurers of the universe, alone the users of imagination, alone in self-analysing.

Therefore, with man's power to fear, to doubt, to measure his ignorance, to look within himself, to suffer and to look forward to parting and death, one might think he would walk the world in sorrow and in darkness, a disbeliever or at least an agnostic.

But this is not what man does; rather he walks the earth with his head erect, he goes with a song in his heart, he writes hymns of praise, and he arranges Thanksgiving services adequate for the expression for his joy.

Who knows the courage of the multitude more than the minister? He has entré to the hearts of his people, and therefore comes to know intimately their sorrows, their fears, their distresses,—but as the dominant atmosphere of their lives he sees their thanksgiving and their joy. There is nothing quite so fine as souls that greatly suffer, but whose hearts are still filled with laughter and praise.

My parish, as everyone's, has many such. They make me to have confidence in the universe; to feel that no apparent defeat can rob us of victory. They make me to know that happiness is not finally to be found in the material things or even in their body; but in that deathless quality that can possess the soul in the darkness of midnight, that can even rejoice when this physical life is diminished to its feeblest state.

There is Grandma ———, who has been in her bed for two years and who has suffered much; but she has some secret of joy that the foot-ball athlete does not know. This Thanksgiving will not be dreary for her. Shut in, limited, suffering, still her soul goes out in praise and prayer. She has an inward evidence, worth more than worlds, that life is good and the finality of life is harmony. Therefore she gives thanks.

Here is Brother ———, who has been struggling with cancer for many months. He has spent nearly everything he has. Recently he put a mortgage on his little home in order to get money enough to try one more doctor. Why he should be called upon to suffer as he has done, I do not know. No one has yet been wise enough to tell us. Even the Master ventured no word upon this dark problem. "Curse God and die," a few sufferers have said; but to the glory of our humanity the vast majority of the grievously afflicted have believed that they are moving on to a home without tears or pain. "Pray with me," said our brother, and after the prayer he whispered, "Yes, God is good, very good." How does he know? Ah,

> "Sorrow is hard to bear, and doubt is slow to clear;
> Each traveler says his say, his scheme of the weal and woe;
> But God has a few of us whom He whispers in the ear;
> The rest may reason and welcome: 'Tis we sufferers know."

And then—but I cannot specify more—there are many sufferers in every parish, but most of them these days are giving thanks for the goodness of God. They hearten us who are strong and well. They give us an evidence of our faith that is beyond the horizon of the materialist. Who can say that God in his goodness does not come to them with his sustaining grace and give to them in their darkness a light that never was on land or sea?

The Visitor

Richmond, Va., is increasingly a center of importance in the work of the Disciples of Christ. It was the pleasure and good fortune of the Visitor to spend several days in the capital of the Old Dominion State and enjoy the hospitality of the Disciples there.

The Seventh Street Church is the mother church of our people in the city. It has had a long and illustrious pastorate, notable in which are the names of Jabez Hall, J. Z. Tyler, Carey E. Morgan, and J. J. Haley. During the pastorate of H. D. C. Maclachlan, its present leader, notable things have been accomplished. The church is splendidly situated for downtown work. It is directly opposite the finely equipped Young Men's Christian Association Building. With Mr. Maclachlan's coming to the pastorate fresh emphasis was laid upon the Sunday-school work, and additional property was secured for a parish house in which the educational and institutional features of the church could develop. The membership numbers from 750 to 800 and the property is probably worth $175,000. Mr. Maclachlan has become a notable figure in the religious life of Richmond. His work as an interpreter of religious education is recognized in all the churches. He is perhaps the best preacher in the city, and his personality has brought him the earnest friendship of the best people in Richmond, quite apart from denominational relationships.

The Allen Avenue Church enjoys the ministry of Henry Pearce Atkins. He has been eleven years with his church and has seen it grow from an infant to its present membership of more than 300. He built the present structure which is the chapel of a building that will be a genuine contribution to the religious architecture of the most promising residential part of the city. Many efforts have been made to lure Mr. Atkins away from his present field. Such a man attracts attention. But every year increases his efficiency at Allen Avenue, and it is hoped that he many remain with his devoted people for many years to come.

The occasion of the Visitor's stay in Richmond was the gathering of the Ministerial Institute of Virginia. A considerable number of the important men among the churches in the state were present, including C. M. Watson of Norfolk, Richie Ware of Lynchburg, J. G. Halliday connected with the naval Y. M. C. A. of Norfolk, J. O. Halsabeck of Smyrna, J. B. Hamaker of Strasburg, J. E. De Gafferley of Newport News, F. A. Zigler of Petersburg, D. S. Henkel of Chatham, J. A. Jayne of Hampton, and the Richmond ministers including those already named and George Kemper of Marshall Street, Gerald Culberson of the Third Church, F. W. Long of South Richmond, and R. E. Groseclose of Fairmount Avenue.

It was a great satisfaction to have fellowship with these fine men in the study of the Scriptures through several days. Such themes as the Life of Christ and The Early Days of Christianity were the subjects of inquiry. And both in the formal presentation of the facts and in the give-and-take of conference it was pleasure to mark the open-mindedness and reverence of the group. The institute was the guest of the Allen Avenue Church, and Mr. Atkins, its pastor, and the hospitality afforded was generous and delightful.

The interests of our churches in Virginia are healthy and promising. Few of them are strong or able to reward adequately the men who labor for them. The result has been that heavy losses have been sustained by the churches in the call of their ministers to other fields. But the resources of the congregations are gradually being developed. And the educational ideal is being lifted as the churches realize the value of an educated ministry. H. C. Combs, the state secretary, is rendering efficient service. Many of the churches in the state have new buildings or enlargements of their plants. All the churches in Richmond have recently built new structures or have added something to their equipment.

The educational work in the state is likewise encouraging. The Bible Chair at the University of Virginia is a source of pride to the Disciples of the Old Dominion. By the generous gifts of the family of Colonel John B. Cary of Richmond, aided by the efforts of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in the state, this foundation has been made permanent and is now recognized as an integral part of the University of Virginia, its work receiving the same credit as that of other departments. Professor W. M. Forrest, the incumbent, is a valuable and efficient representative of the brotherhood in this capacity. And he is admirably aided by the influence of Professor C. W. Kent, the head of the Department of English, who has borne much of the responsibility for this work since its introduction at Charlottesville many years ago.

The Virginia Christian College near Lynchburg has recently called S. T. Willis of New York to its presidency. For many years it was under the direction of Josephus Hopwood who still retains his connection with the institution. It has now about 200 students and property worth probably $150,000. Earnest efforts are making to bring this college up to the standard of efficiency as an important factor in the work of the Disciples in the state.

One cannot meet such people as those who make up the brotherhood in Virginia and especially in Richmond without realizing something of the warmth of hospitality and the depth of Christian interest which make efficient the testimony of our people throughout that commonwealth. A visit there is always a source of satisfaction. H. L. W.

Editorial Table Talk

Woman in Public Policy

Rev. C. G. Kindred of Englewood Church, Chicago, set a good example to ministers by praising Mayor Harrison for his vigorous determination to get at the root of the police department's graft with vice. Ministers are too likely to deliver a tirade against the public official who does wrong and to question the motives of the official who sets about doing right. Mr. Harrison, it is true, is assuming a new role in his present administration, but this is no reason why his motives may not be perfectly disinterested. What hidden, subtle influences play upon a public man's mind to determine his policy, was suggested by Mr. Kindred when he connected the mayor's present program with the mayor's wife. "Mrs. Carter H. Harrison has shown her feelings in the books that she has written for children," Mr. Kindred said. "It is easy to see that a beautiful influence, such as she shows in her literary work, will accomplish great things when exerted upon a man in a position of great responsibility such as a mayor occupies." It was proclaimed in the newspapers some weeks ago that the daring raids upon gambling dens by Assistant Chief of Police Schuettler, were inspired by his wife whose telephone had been kept busy by wives of the victims of the gambling habit urging her to use her influence with her husband to put the gamblers out of business. The Assistant Chief forthwith challenged his superior's claim that gambling was non-existent in Chicago, and proved his position by raiding any number of gambling places. All of which goes to suggest that woman needs not to wait until she gets the ballot before she begins to count one in the cause of civic reform.

Tact in Christian Conversation

Almost everyone is conscious of great difficulty in so directing conversation with a non-Christian as to bring the subject before him with effect. In answer to an inquiry on this subject, Prof. David Smith, D. D., in the British Weekly says that sincerity is the first condition, and second, tact. On this he says:

"Tact is the knack of handling people, and it is the best safeguard of religious conversation. It is surely obvious that spiritual intercourse presupposes mutual knowledge and trust. You must have an adequate acquaintance with a man's condition that you may speak the fitting word; and he must be assured of your qualification for 'ministering to a mind diseased' that he may receive it. It is stupid and vulgar impertinence to assail a stranger with spiritual questions or suggestions. 'Your brother's soul,' says a Russian proverb, 'is as a dark forest;' and we should always reverence the veiled mystery of a human personality. Perhaps some good people are rather apt to forget that what the Lord requires is not that we should talk about him, but that we should exhibit him, and let him speak for himself. It is not what one says but what one is that tells, and a Christ-like spirit is the most eloquent testimony for Christ, and the most effective commendation of the Gospel. It is like the odor of Mary's ointment which filled the chamber, or the radiance of the lamp, which, without noise, 'giveth light to all that are in the house.' 'Let your light,' says Jesus, 'so shine.' Character, and not least Christian character, is self-revealing. Be a simple, kindly, big-hearted Christian gentleman, and there will be no need for you to advertise your faith, or cry up the grace which has made you what you are. That is a striking contrast which Minucius Felix draws in his Octavius between the Christians and the disputatious philosophers: Non eloquimur magna sed vivimus, 'We do not spout great things; we live them.'"

This Should Surely Get a Crowd!

Religion is pretty hard pressed to get a hearing, if one may judge from the "stunts" to which ministers and churches resort to bring the crowd. The cheapening and coarsening of religion by present day evangelism puts many a pastor's grace to the limit-test in resisting the temptation to do the vulgar thing himself. The people expect cleverness. They have been led to expect it by leaders whose fame for result-getting is far and wide. Be clever, even if you must be vulgar, is the devil's whisper to many a minister. Here evidently is a pastor who has succumbed to this temptation. He writes to his town paper announcing his sermon topic and service in the following fashion. "Tonight the Methodist brethren, with Rev. Stuntz as the sky pilot, will give a feed in the basement of the Christian church. Yeller legged chicken, regulation church social coffee and all other things going with it will be served to order. For Christ's sake come and get your money's worth and at the same time A. L. Zink will dispense brain and spiritual provender upstairs to those who care to stop and hear it, for the nominal sum of nothing and you are welcome. The subject of the evening sermon will be "Naaman, the Leper—His History and Cure." Better bring someone along if you are afraid of the dark or "Billy the Ax Smasher," for uncanny things are likely to creep into this sort of a discourse. You are cordially invited to all of the above now and forever, amen, so mote it be." This sort of leadership gets its reward. But it is not the reward of a true minister of Christ's gospel.

The Democratic Note

Some have supposed that old communions like the Congregationalists were marked in their aristocratic tendencies. That the new note of democracy has come to be sounded everywhere is to be seen by a perusal of the best religious journals of the day. The following quotation from the Congregationalist and Christian World indicates this fact:

The nation-wide hunt for several million men alleged to be missing from their proper places in the church raises anew the question of quality versus numbers. Are we after more men or more man? Both, undoubtedly, and women in larger numbers, too. The church is re-enforced every time it casts its net into the sea of human life and secures for its fellowship and service a miscellaneous catch of average men and women. We have no right to discriminate between so-called "key men" in the community—merchants, bankers, physicians, lawyers—and those who wield the pick or carry the hod. What we ought to emphasize in our quest is the kind of Christian the recruit ought to become, and how much the addition of a few persons or of even one man, whose eyes have been open and whose heart responds to twentieth century ideals of Christian living, may mean.

—In introducing Dr. B. B. Tyler at one of the numerous functions connected with the dedication of the new church in Louisville, Dr. E. L. Powell classified the "Doctors" among the Disciples. He said of Dr. Tyler: "He is a real doctor of divinity—a title conferred on him by another denomination for his scholarly achievements, his profound knowledge and his high order of Christianity. As our denomination—Disciples of Christ—does not confer that degree on its ministers, the most of us who are known as doctors, are doctors of the curbstone variety."

—Speaker Champ Clark, lecturing in the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, recently told about his first debate. "My first debate," said Champ Clark, "was held in a country school in Kentucky and was on the momentous question, 'Is there more pleasure in pursuit than in possession.' I am still muddled on that proposition!" In view of Mr. Clark's candidacy for President, it would seem that he has a possible philosophy from which he can extract sufficient comfort if he should fail!

—The newspapers tell of the theft from the Central Christian Church, Detroit, of several articles of value, among them the "clerical robes" of Rev. C. J. Tanner! What innovation is Pastor Tanner introducing in Detroit?

The Rev. Dr. Nehemiah

The Minister You Appreciate After He is Gone

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

It was a great day for the First Congregational Church in Jerusalem, when it called the Rev. Dr. Nehemiah to be its pastor. This occurred in the summer of the year 444 B. C. Nehemiah came from Babylon, where most of the great preachers of that day came from. It is a mistake to suppose that those of the Jews, who first returned out of exile, were the most spiritually minded; there were many good men among them, but their average cannot have been great. Every real spiritual impulse that came to Jerusalem in the next hundred years, originated in Babylon. Jerusalem all the while doubted the orthodoxy of Babylon, but went to it for most of its new ideas and all its great preachers.

Nehemiah followed an amiable and cultured gentleman of scholarly tastes by the name of Ezra. Ezra still stayed as pastor emeritus, and the two men, though very different, got on nicely together. There had been a great revival under Ezra, followed by a greater slump, and an attempt at social reform had collapsed, leaving a good many people at outs with the minister.

The meeting-house, too, was in bad repair, and the gates had rotted away and been chopped up for firewood.

Nehemiah took two or three days to unpack his books and belongings. On the third night he hired a donkey from a near-by stable, and undertook to ride around Jerusalem by moonlight. It was a very forlorn parish, which he discovered by the light of the moon, and he found the road southeast of the city in such bad repair, that he turned back, and sent the donkey to the stable. It was the only time he ever turned back.

Nehemiah went to work with a will. He did not consult Ezra; he liked Ezra, but they thought along different lines, and Nehemiah did his own planning. He set to work to inaugurate a whirlwind campaign and rebuild the walls of Jerusalem.

There were many who said it could never be done. Nehemiah heard in round-about fashion of direct opposition and hostility on the part of these who had opposed his coming.

"Does he think he can make anything out of that church? Can he re-hang the gates that I chopped up for kindling? Does he imagine he can do the whole thing before night?"

Nehemiah heard these things. He heard it was said with scorn that the kind of wall he proposed to build would tumble the first time a fox jumped over it. These words stirred his soul, and he wrote down the names of the men who said them, and repeated them in his prayers at night, and the thing for which he prayed was not that those men might have a particularly easy time in heaven.

In spite of all hostility, the wall began to go up. Nehemiah worked hard and contributed nearly all his salary, and the work actually got under way. Then he heard "ten times from all places," as he says, rumors that he never could finish it; that the thing had about reached its limit.

He got it half done. "We built the wall; and all the wall was joined together unto half the height thereof, for the people had a mind to work."

Half way up! Now for the other half!

Have you ever noticed that ominous halt that comes when a great thing is half done?

There began to be strange mutterings, and some unexplained silences.

Nehemiah started to make some pastoral calls on some prominent men whom he had missed from church. He called on one of these named Shemaiah, and found the front door locked.

Shemaiah let him in, and led him to the back parlor, and drew the shade down, and said:

"Sh-h-h! There's a terrible plot on hand! People are getting rebellious. They say you have been crowding them too hard. They are determined to oust you! Let us stay here until dark, and then slip through the alley to the church, and get in and bolt the door! They mean to kill you in the night!"

In that moment the first thing Nehemiah thought of was his own self-esteem and pastoral dignity. Maybe it ought not to have been so, but Nehemiah was very human.

Said he, "Should such a man as I flee? And who is there that, being such a man as I, would flee to the temple to save his life? I will not go in."

Good for you, Nehemiah! I glory in your spunk!

Then Nehemiah looked at the prominent citizen who had brought him these tidings, and saw his craven soul. Secretly his heart was with the minister's enemies.

"And I discerned, and lo, God had not sent him."

Nehemiah, I am glad you discovered that fact. It must have given you a lot of comfort.

Nehemiah did some preaching, but more planning. It was sometimes complained against him that he dabbled in too many things, and was more of a politician than a preacher. He both preached and practiced.

In a whirlwind campaign that lasted fifty-two days, that church did the work of years, and when it was finished, the pastor did not resign, as he often does in such cases.

But he was very tired. He says that during that time he did not remove his clothes for the purposes of sleep, but he adds that he took his regular bath, with his gun beside the bath-tub.

Nehemiah finished repairing the meeting house early in the autumn, and on the first day of October he called a great assembly. Then he told them that they ought to match this fine material achievement with more of Bible reading and family worship; and on the 24th of October, 444 B. C., they had an installation service, which is one of the most memorable in history.

Nehemiah was pastor in Jerusalem for twelve years. He was charged with being self-willed, and that was true. He was said to be conceited, and you may read what he said of himself and see. He was said to be a less scholarly preacher than Ezra. But he brought things to pass. Finally, when he resigned, a good many in his congregation were glad to see his train pull out of town, but everybody agreed that he had been an able man in the church and a public spirited citizen, and nobody called him a coward. Soon after he left, Jerusalem began to miss him. He had proved useful in more ways than anybody realized. The people who had complained that he was a member of nearly all the committees, and in some the whole committee, began to wish he was back. And after a while they called him back. And I wish I could say that they behaved better the second time.

I got to thinking about this a while ago when I visited a town where there had been a very active and versatile and efficient minister. He could have been a very able preacher, had he not been interested in so many other things. Even as it was, he was a fair preacher. And he built a new church, and started a lecture course, and began a movement for a public library, and fought a campaign that drove out the saloons, and did a hundred other things. But while he was there, people were constantly saying they wished he would not dabble in so many things; that the church paid him a salary to work for the church; that all these things were well enough, but some of them stirred up opposition that hurt the finances of the church. And when his new church was half way up some of his best supporters said it was a mistake, that that town could never pay for so large a church.

About the time the church was dedicated, he was called to a church twice as large, and the reason he went, as I verily believe, was that he was nagged by these criticisms. I happened to be in that town on the next Fourth of July, and it was like a Sunday. I said to a prominent citizen, "I thought you had big celebrations here, and of a high order, with good oratory and processions and music and floats and an appeal to patriotism?"

"Sure!" he replied. "We used to. But we can't have nothing any more. We had a minister here who used to get up everything like that. He's gone. Hang it all, why did this town ever let such a man go? I wish he was back."

I said to him, "It was the way they did things to Nehemiah."

"Nehemiah?" asked he. "Who's Nehemiah?"

"He is the minister you appreciate after he has gone."

Some Harvest Facts

Illinois, the great black soil state, was first in corn raising this year, which was not a banner year for crops by any means. The full effect of the drought and intensely hot weather of the last summer was reflected in the government crop report. It showed that the production of corn in the United States, which at the beginning of the season promised to exceed the bumper crop of last year, was smaller by 349,418,000 bushels than last year's crop. Notwithstanding this great decrease in production, the crop this year goes down as the third largest in the history of the country, having been exceeded only by those of 1910 and 1906. There were decreases in production in all of the principal corn-growing states, except in Ohio, Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Georgia, South Carolina and Alabama. Illinois led in production and Iowa and Missouri maintained their standing as second and third producing states. Potatoes showed a falling off of 57,076,000 bushels. Only Wisconsin showed an increase in their production. Flaxseed was about the only principal crop showing an increased production this year, about half again as much as last year having been grown. There was a striking decrease in the production of tobacco, amounting to 196,000,000 pounds less than last year's crop. In Kentucky alone the loss was 11,000,000 pounds. The country will not feel it very much even if the tobacco crop was not up to standard.

The Problem of Ministerial Suply

A Discriminating Study and a Suggested Duty

BY AUSTIN HUNTER.

What are the facts with reference to the decrease in number of those who are preparing for the ministry? Is it true that there is a real falling away? Prof. Shailer Matthews in a published article some months ago said, "All over the world the number of young men who are being educated as clergymen is growing smaller. In America the situation has become acute among the Northern Baptists." In confirmation of this he points out that "in the eleven Baptist colleges east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio there were precisely twenty-six men who were studying for the ministry who graduated in the senior classes of that year (some three or four years ago.) Out of the 1,200 in Harvard, Yale, Columbia and Princeton graduating that same year only twenty-eight of all denominations are reported as intending to enter the ministry. Among the hundreds of young men at the Y. M. C. A. conferences at Geneva, Williams Bay and Northfield not more than twenty men were preparing for the ministry, and these young men, let it be remembered, were representatives of the most active Christian life of our educational institutions and belonged to all denominations."

Among Disciples.

As to the Disciples of Christ the Christian Evangelist in an editorial said, "Nothing is more manifest in our current history than that the supply of properly trained ministers is unequal to the demand." While our own body has perhaps suffered less by a ministerial shortage than other groups, nevertheless the problem is growing increasingly keen with us. Geo. W. Muckley computes that we have only 3,200 men who may properly be called ministers, and that we are losing at the rate of 200 a year. If this is true the time when we shall be a disappearing brotherhood is much nearer than some of us have supposed. Moreover it must be remembered that the ranks of our own ministry are increased by those coming from the ministry of other churches such as is possibly the case in no other religious body. Furthermore, it is to be expected that in a democratic movement such as our own, where one can enter the ministry free from ecclesiastical restrictions and find an open field even before leaving the preparatory department, there would be more of an increase in the ministry than in other churches. But notwithstanding all this, our own people are suffering by this lack and we see everywhere a decided tendency away from the ministry as a vocation for life.

Men Leaving Ministry.

Furthermore, let it be remembered that there is not only a lack of men entering the ministry, but that there is a marked increasing tendency among those who are already in the ministry to leave it and take up other lines of work. Every large city has many men who were formerly ministers, who are now dentists, doctors, osteopaths, lawyers, merchants, real-estate men, promoters and music publishers. A prominent minister in Indiana made the assertion that the average length of service among ministers among Disciples is only nine years. I do not know how true his statement may be, but if it is any where near the truth our problem is an alarming one.

As to the causes of this situation there has been much diversity of opinion. Some hasten at once to the conclusion that it is due to the liberal teachings of the present, the prevalence of the historical method of biblical research, and the growing spirit of rationalism in our higher institutions of learning. It is contended that young men do not care to take up a work the very foundations of which are more or less uncertain. But to this position even so conservative a journal as the Christian Standard strongly demurs and says, "Such a hypothesis stands in the face of the fact that a large per cent of the young men in our colleges and universities are believers and are working in various ways, especially through the Y. M. C. A. for the cause of Christ. Thousands of these young men are studying the Bible under critical leaders and are not weakened in faith thereby."

Rev. Austin Hunter.

Neither Liberalism nor Conservatism.

On the other hand, the man of liberal views insists that it is due to too much conservatism, and that a young man will not assume a vocation where his thinking is hampered and where he must face a cry of heresy for an honest expression of his views. But over against that is the fact that the most liberal churches are the greatest sufferers for the want of ministers. The Unitarians are an example. Certainly they are liberal enough. They do not even have a paper pope. Yet the men are few and far between who are entering the ranks of the Unitarian ministry. It is not a question of either conservatism or liberalism.

Others insist that the real difficulty lies in the doing away with the old fashioned life-long pastorate, where the pastor grew old in the service of the church which had the benefit of his youth as well as his age and experience. "Is it any wonder," says one, "that a young man hesitates to enter the ministry when he knows that just about the time when he ought to be best equipped for service he will be no longer wanted?" But in answer to this it may be said that among those churches where pastorates are short preachers have multiplied as rapidly as among those where the pastorates are long. For instance, some years ago when Methodist preachers were expected to move about every year, preachers multiplied more rapidly than in almost all the other churches together. This does not strike at the root of the problem. Neither does the mistreatment of preachers on the part of the congregation, of which there have been many deplorable instances nor the self-constituted committee on the change of pastor. These are minor matters and do not drive consecrated men out of the ministry nor deter them from entering it.

The Spirit of the Age.

That the cause of this situation must be found more in the spirit of the age and the tendency of the times than in the church itself, I think is evident from the fact that the church is not the only body that is suffering from a defection of leaders. The same situation obtains to an alarming extent among school teachers. There has been a marked exodus from the ranks of the teaching profession into other lines of work, so much so that in some places it has become a practical impossibility to secure sufficient teachers. There is doubtless a commercial reason for this. Prof. Bennett, of the Indianapolis High School, by an extensive collation of figures pointed out that the average hod-carrier receives better wages than the average high school teacher. The splendid opportunities which this commercial age offers to bright young people in business lines draws them from the ill-paid ranks of the teaching profession.

Many Factors.

While there are many factors that enter into the problem, I believe the broad underlying cause is to be found in the enormous attractions of the commercial callings of our day with their promise of immediate and large rewards, the feeling that the ministry does not promise a work sufficiently appreciated or rewarded as compared with other vocations. The commercial spirit has a tremendous hold upon all ranks of our present day life. The world weighs the man in the commercial balances. If found to be light he is considered weak. Hence the minister is looked upon as a weakling by thousands of people. This, every energetic self-respecting man resents. In connection with this thought, Mr. Everett T. Tomlinson in the World's Work says he wrote to twenty successful pastors asking whether if they had their lives to live over again they would select the work they are now doing. Seven replied yes, three were uncertain while the remaining ten gave emphatic negatives. If these answers are at all representative they reflect an unfortunate feeling on the part of the ministers themselves to their own work.

Ministers Not Recognized as Specialists.

Still another factor in the problem is the feeling that ministers are not accorded the respect which their training and position demands. In a world like the present we must have specialists. The preacher is a specialist, and yet he finds himself pulled down on a level with unschooled, opinionated people who hold and promote the idea that he is no better qualified and no more able for his high position than themselves. The reply of Garfield to Isaac Errett's entreaty that he remain in the ministry, is in point: "I do not care to be bossed around by a lot of ignorant elders."

The time was when the ministry was held to be the most honorable of callings in the esteem of Christian people. Some years ago parents dedicated their children to the ministry from birth and mothers looked forward with eager hope to such a career for their sons. This, to say the least, is not the situation at the present time. It is an open question if a boy in the average Christian home should express his desire to preach the gospel as a life work whether his parents would not try to disuade him from his purpose. But back of this question is the greater question, why do his parents look upon it in that way, and the answer to that question is largely to be found in the present commercial spirit.

A Transition Period.

Another factor which I think enters into our problem is the fact that we are in a transition period. That is to say, the old denominational enthusiasm has practically passed away and the larger enthusiasm for Christ and his church has not yet fully taken its place. Young men have not the heart to enter enthusiastically upon a flat-footed denominational career in the pulpit. On the other hand they fear the experiment of entering denominational pulpits in an undenominational spirit. They could hardly expect to be generally acceptable.

Finally, may we not say there is needed a new sense of responsibility on the part of parents, preachers, college teachers and young men themselves with respect to this matter. The young manhood of our day is looking abroad over the field of activity to discern where there are the amplest promises of rewarded effort. No young man wishes to put his life in a place where it will not count in the world's work. The ranks of the ministry have in every generation included a great body of lofty-souled, heroic and consecrated men whose lives have been the benediction of their generation and the choice possession of the church. This must continue to be the case. There may be temporary slackings of the tide or eddies in the current that divert attention from this high calling, but not for long.

Home and Local Churches.

The replenishment of the ministry must lie with the home and the local church, and the responsibility in both cases in the last analysis is upon the preacher. The man, who as a messenger of Christ, utters no word from year to year upon the high calling which he himself represents, not only fails in one of his most important duties, but presents a curious comment upon his own work. It is the minister who attracts the attention of young men to this field, and it is the minister who from time to time in public speech must emphasize the duty of young manhood to undertake this order of work. "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that he may send forth laborers into the harvest field."

Thanksgiving

BY B. W. BURLEIGH.

The fruitage of the harvest
Is gleaned and garnered in,
While we with glad contentment
Have crowded loft and bin.
The many million acres
Where myriad cattle rove,
Have yielded up their riches
In choicest treasure-trove.

Within our wide-flung borders
There is no sound of war;
Without, no hostile nation
Besieges from afar.
Sweet Peace her golden scepter
Extends from shore to shore.
We are a much-blessed people!
What could we ask for more!

Let him who loves his country
And fears his country's God,
Be thankful that no despot
Rules us with tyrant's rod.
Let us for peace and plenty
Our glad thanksgiving raise,
And give to God, our Father,
Our loyal meed of praise!

Own, if you can, one of those welcome faces
That bring the sunshine to life's shadowed places. —Nixon Waterman.

The Concentric Confession of Cosmopolitan Christian

TAKEN IN THE YEAR 1920.

"Are you a Christian?"

"I certainly am."

"To what church do you belong?"

"I belong to the Baptist, Methodist, Episcopal, Presbyterian, Congregational and Christian churches, those being the only churches in town, save the Catholic church into which I could not enter without relinquishing my membership in the other churches which I was not willing to do.

"What! Do you mean to say that you belong to all these churches?"

"Exactly so. I am a member in good standing in all of them. I contribute to the treasury of each and I take part in the business proceedings of them all so far as I can avoid conflicting engagements. Furthermore, I am a deacon in the Baptist church, an elder in the Christian church and I have hopes of serving the other churches in some official capacity sooner or later."

"Whew! You are certainly an easy-going religionist and cosmopolitan in your faith. How have you disposed of your conscience and what about those "conscientious beliefs" that good churchmen are supposed to have? What have you done with your religious convictions?"

"My conscience is intact. As for my religious convictions, I have one paramount religious conviction that all God's people should be one and the plan I am pursuing of having membership in all the churches that will admit me is the only plan that allows full play for the employment of that one outstanding conviction of mine. I may have abused slightly certain other important principles but at least I have not sacrificed the most important of them all."

"What is to be gained by the course you are pursuing?"

"First, the maintenance of a friendly feeling towards all and the disappearance of malice and envy. I can sincerely rejoice in the prosperity of any church in town. Secondly, I am in a position to work to advantage for church union. I can vote for union as well as pray for it and back of my plea for union, there are the six ballots that I will cast when it comes to a vote. Great changes must be wrought in all the churches before union can be accomplished. My position enables me to foster the spirit of union and to further the plans for union: to modify, to change where modification and change are needed and to act without charge of ulterior motive."

"Are the different churches satisfied with your course?"

"Well, some object to my multiple membership, but for the most part I am well received by all my brethren. I am as good a Methodist as any of them: I am regarded as a full-fledged Baptist: my Presbyterian friends say that I was predestinated to be a Presbyterian and my Christian brethren think that I am still one of their number."

"Well——!" E. W. McD.

November woods are bare and still,
November days are clear and bright;
Each moon burns up the morning's chill,
The morning's snow is gone by night.
Each day my steps grow slow, grow light,
As through the woods, I reverent creep,
Watching all things "lie down to sleep."

Carlotta

The Ex-Empress Who Has Been Insane Forty-four Years.

The mad ex-Empress of Mexico kept her birthday recently, and members of the Belgian royal family journeyed out to the Chateau de Bochout to wish her "many happy returns." This wish seems almost a mockery, says the American Woman's Review, for the seventy-first birthday of the Empress Carlotta.

Ever since 1867 she has been mad, and had to be looked after as a mad woman. Her brother, Leopold II., took charge of her, and she has never left Belgium since. They were devoted as children to each other, and one of the King's choicest treasures was a marble figure of his sister as a child.

For years the ex-Empress was lodged in the Terneuzen Palace, but in those days she was very violent, and contrived to set it on fire and burn it down. She has become more quiet, but leads a strange life. She never goes outside her own park gates, and for many years would see no one but her ladies in waiting. But of late she does not refuse to see members of the royal family, though she never speaks to them.

For a good many years she had a hallucination that she would be poisoned through her food. So a special servant carried her meals into a private room, which he locked. Then the Empress entered, locked the door and partook of her meal alone. Now she is more reasonable, and eats with her ladies in waiting. She has lapses of silence of years duration; then she will begin to talk again, but always of trivial things, and she never refers to the past.

She reads books and papers, but never makes any reference to what she reads. All newspapers were kept from her when King Leopold died, as the news of his death would, it was feared, cause a shock. But she reads the journals again now and must know he is dead, but makes no reference to it.

She plays the piano constantly, but only just those pieces which she learned as a girl, and though a good performer she cannot be persuaded to look at a new composition. She always plays cards in the evenings with one of her three ladies in waiting; but always in silence, and it is an unwritten law that she must be allowed to win the game. She seldom speaks, and always impersonally, never using even the royal "we."

From time to time some of the leading medical men make an examination of her health. Not long ago she completely surprised one of them by speaking to him. She called him to the window and said, "Do you see a serpent coiled round those trees?" The doctor, thinking to humor her, said he did.

"And," she went on, "do you see a serpent coiled round the branch above him?" The doctor saw that, too, and many other strange things besides—or said he did. "Then," she cried, angrily, "it is you who are mad and not I; for I see none of those things."

She is extremely particular about her dignity and exacts every ounce of the prestige which was hers as the Empress of Mexico. Nothing makes her so angry as for any one to refer to her as the Princess. In all her weak moments she never forgets her once great position. It is small wonder that—her mind being fixed at the moment when she lost her reason—she cannot believe she has changed in power. Having once seen herself in a mirror under her changed conditions, she screamed out, "No! no!" and because frightfully agitated. She could not believe that the wrinkled, bent figure in the mirror was the once lovely Princess Charlotte. Since then mirrors have been abolished in the chateau.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Woman's Day in the Church

The first Sunday in December is the one time in the year when the Auxiliaries of The Christian Woman's Board of Missions ask the privilege of presenting this work before the churches. An offering is taken at this time, but the objection is still being urged that, as the Woman's Board has its own constituency of women and children who pay an annual sum into its treasury, therefore they should not ask support from the church at large like our other benevolent, evangelistic and missionary societies.

In the beginning of the work, the ten cents a month from the women, and the five cents a month from the children sufficed; but since our enterprises have grown to be so large and numerous, it does not meet one-third of our expenses. Much of this growth is the result of the confidence of our brethren in the able and nominal management of our work; the missions in Jamaica, the evangelistic work in Porto Rico, and our Educational and Evangelistic Work for the Negro were bequests from the American Christian Missionary Society; our First Mountain Schools were also legacies from our brethren. Surely, it is but fair to give them an opportunity once a year to contribute to their support!

Our Bible chairs in state universities, our Oriental missions on the Pacific Coast, our work in Mexico and Argentina have no parallels in other boards of our brotherhood, and there are many outside our membership who are glad to share in these important enterprises.

But the offering is not the greatest aim of three services. The poet wrote, "The gift without the giver is bare," and a greater than the poet said of the model givers of the early church, "They First gave themselves. If we could but win the intelligent interest, the whole hearted sympathy of our churches with out achievements and ideals, the results of the past thirty years would be but an earnest of greater things in the years to come.

But our chief emphasis on this day is upon gaining the allegiance and coöperation of the women of the church. Our growth in membership has always halted behind our growth in offerings. Here is our greatest weakness, here, consequently, our greatest need. It could hardly have been otherwise, for the most valuable things are always the hardest to get and how much greater is a woman than a dollar!

Our plea for increased membership is primarily because the work needs the women. One of the penalties of success is growth, and growth demands enlargement of the organization and its resources. How long we prayed for open doors; and how the good Father has shamed us by wide flung portals on every side! One of the hardest and the saddest tasks of the National Executive Committee is to say "No" to the many calls that come from the poor and needy. Our hearts are turning to the great field of social service—to the submerged truth in our cities, to the exceeding great and bitter cry of the prisoners of the White Slave Traffic. These and many other calls sound in our ears and hearts—would that all the women of our churches would join our ranks, so that we might enter the many fields that are now white unto harvest!

Every Christian is expected to make the best of himself for Christ's sake; he must not only do the Master's Work, but be meet for the Master's use, thoroughly prepared for every good work to which he may be called. Culture then, of body, mind and spirit is demanded of every child of God. The women of the church will find the monthly meeting of the auxiliaries one of its greatest cultural agencies; here, and in the mission study classes, the members learn the thrilling facts in the story of missions—the history, the religious, and the social conditions of the great nations which have not yet received their heritage in the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. Here they learn to tell what they know without embarrassment or self-consciousness; many of our best public speakers received their early training in these quiet, unheralded meetings.

Here they learn practical business methods in the conduct of organizations, and the management of their resources.

There is no such medium for spiritual culture in the church as the missionary spirit. A great English churchman said not long ago, "I wish I could make every man and every woman feel that it is for their own spiritual life that they should take an enthusiastic part in missionary work; it is a duty they owe to themselves."

I pray that many women may use C. W. B. M. Day as a means of performing this duty to themselves, their fellow men, and their God! I. W. H.

Why Modern Women Are Thankful

FRANCES KINGDON.

It was just the day to invite confidences, stormy and cold outside, but within the artistic living room there were a warmth and cheeriness most pleasing to the three friends sitting around the fire-place.

"Oh, dear," said one of the women, looking out of the window, "how I hope this blizzard will be entirely gone by Thanksgiving time. I make only two special demands upon the weather man the entire year, and on those two days I insist that he should do his best for me and then some. It seems only right that my birthday, the one individual, personal day of the year to me, should be perfect. It comes in April, when as every one knows the weather can take all sorts of liberties and be as freakish as it pleases, but still there are possibilities for coaxing the sun to shine and a balmy, sweet breeze to give one young, happy feelings. Then I do like to have Thanksgiving day all right, vigorous, exhilarating and bracing, with a steady, sure hint of the sun not far away. It is so much easier to be thankful that day if the clouds do remain hidden and the wind isn't hostile or the skies tearful."

"Speaking about being thankful," began another woman, "I don't make any New Year's resolutions, but I've been brought up to believe that it was only decent to be grateful on Thanksgiving day for favors duly received. This year, however, I am not going to make acknowledgment only for the things I have received but give thanks for those that have not come my way. I have counted up some of the "might have beens" in my life the last twelve month, and I am going to sing my song of praise because they never were. I am grateful for all my new blessings, but I am more grateful for not having to give up any of the old ones. We women are always wishing for things—we get up in the morning with a longing for the unattainable and we go to bed at night with the same desire—what it is depends upon our circumstances or our dispositions, but if we think too much about it the ache in our hearts grows so big it hurts. So often we say, 'Oh, if I had all the pleasures of this friend, or the money of that friend, or the love or ability of another friend, I'd be so thankul.' Yet why do we not, instead of selecting all those we envy, think more of those who probably envy us and give thanks because we do not have to carry their burdens, share their humiliations, know their struggles and sorrow. The other day, such a sad gloomy sort of a day, when you would feel like crying a little bit even if you were sitting in the lap of luxury, a tired, refined looking woman came to my door to demonstrate a vacuum cleaner. The box she carried was almost as big as she was, and she had climbed many, many stairs with it and walked several miles against a cruelly cold wind. I did not order one of the cleaners for the simple reason that I had one already, but over a cheering cup of hot tea I learned a little, but guessed more, of her forlorn life, and afterward I did some real Thanksgiving thinking. I gave thanks for my comfortable, pretty apartment, instead of having to live in a back bedroom with light housekeeping privileges; I gave thanks for my weekly check to pay the grocery bill, instead of being obliged to count over a few pitiful nickels to buy a cheap dinner at a twenty-cent restaurant on a side street; I felt thankful for all the warm clothes that hung in my closet; to be sure there weren't any velvet gowns there or mink furs, but there was something else besides one little, thin, shiny, serge suit and a hat quite faded and streaked. More than anything else was I grateful for that end of the day which brought home close around me the true hearts of those I love, instead of long, dreary hours all alone. We women who are sheltered, protected and indulged, taking our every day blessings as a matter of course, celebrate such a different Thanksgiving from the woman who is thankful for just the chance to make a living."

"Last year," said another woman, moving back from the fire, "I was thankful merely on general principles, but now I belong to a special class which numbers all the mothers in our country whose sons have safely survived the football season. I know now how mothers felt in days gone by when they sent their only son, handsome, manly, undaunted, out to fight for his country, because I've had to send my only boy to the football field. Talk about the stuff soldiers are made of—pluck, determination and courage—you'll see it all when you watch a football game. There you will find the true glory of the conquered, also, for with the score all against them, with the crippled and wounded being carried from the field, you'll see the set jaw and flashing eye of the soldier who says, "fight to the finish," while a thousand young voices on the grand stand shout encouragement as they yell, 'Are we discouraged?' 'No.' 'Are we happy?' 'Yes.' I'm proud of every victory my boy has helped to give his college this fall; I'm proud that he has learned to play the game for all it means and still cry, 'Let the best man win,' but I am thankful, with all the gratitude only an ambitious and loving mother's heart can know, that my great big gridiron hero is as sound and well as on the day he bravely and proudly took his first step alone."

"I, too," said the last woman to speak. 'want to give thanks this year for new reasons, and in thinking it all over I'm more grateful than anything else for the lessons I've learned about human nature. I believe next year is going to be easier in every way because I cannot then make the mistakes I have made this year. I am trying now to remember 'that one ought neither to laugh nor weep at, exalt or curse, a human being's actions, but only to try to understand them.' I believe when we all can do this we will find many little new joys in existence. There will be a lot of happy little surprises found in our friends and new inspirations and broader sympathies. The art of human relationship will be so simple and kind. I am thankful for every experience of the last twelve months which has taught me a clearer, more charitable understanding of my fellow beings. We spend so many hours studying life from books, trying laboriously to read into the printed page a meaning or message which may never be there at all, when we could find it right in the lives of those perhaps nearest and dearest to us. What of the great human dramas, written by the Master playwright, whose pages we never turn? What of the language of the heart which has a dictionary within reach of all who want to read it? And the most beautiful music in the world, can we not hear it in the joy of 'those who laugh and are glad.' and the echo of a requiem of 'those who mourn and cannot be comforted.' I've been learning lessons all my life, and I suppose I will until I die, but this year—oh, I'm thankful for what humanity, big, sorrowful and happy, has taught me."

With the Children

When John Went Round the Corner

BY ANNE GUILBERT MAHON.

"Round the corner" was to John an enchanted spot.

The houses were not as neat or as nice as the ones in John's block, but there were so many boys around there and they did have such good times. John used to see them playing Indian and Wild West and hide and seek whenever he passed there as he went out with his mother.

Sometimes when he had friends playing with him, mother let him go down the street as far as the corner but never around it, for John knew that he must always keep within sight of the window where mother sat with her sewing.

Many times he had asked to be allowed to go around the corner and play with the boys, but mother was firm about it, so John could only watch the boys from a distance and wish he could be there to play with them, too.

"If I only lived around the corner," he would say, wistfully, at times.

He could not understand it when his mother used to answer him, "Perhaps you would not like it as much as you think you would."

One day John's chance came. He was playing out in front of his house when his mother came out dressed to go walking.

"I am going to see grandmother who is ill," she said. "I can't take you this time but I know you will be a good boy at home and not go away from the house. Delia has promised me she will look after you. Be a good boy until mother comes back."

John promised he would, and he meant to, but he did not know then the temptation which would come to him later.

He watched his mother until she disappeared down the street, then he loaded his express wagon with chips and played he was a man selling wood.

It was not long before along came a boy whom John recognized at once as one of those who lived around the corner. The boy stopped and looked at John's wagon in a friendly way, and soon the boys were talking together like old friends.

"There's lots of wood around the corner," suggested the boy, who further informed John that his name was "Dan."

"But, I can't go around the corner," began John, hesitatingly. "Mother doesn't allow me."

"Oho!" laughed Dan. "So you're a mother's boy, are you?"

John's eyes flashed indignantly. He did not like the other's laugh.

"But she isn't home, anyway, is she?" asked Dan, quickly.

"No—"

"Well, then, she'll never know. Oh, come on! There's some fine pieces of wood around there."

It did not take much urging. In spite of some misgivings and prickings of his conscience, John dragged his express wagon and his load of wood around the corner into the enchanted place and joined the boys with whom he had wanted so long to play.

It was all fun at first, John thought. The boys crowded around him, made admiring remarks about his wagon, asked him questions and treated him quite like a hero. They seemed like nice boys, he thought, and mother would say it was all right when he told her how nice they really were and that it was perfectly safe playing "around the corner."

They played hide and seek and tag, and they gave each other rides in John's express wagon. John enjoyed himself so much he had no idea how the time was flying.

The boys were pretty rough, he had to admit once or twice, and they did not talk just as nicely as John's other friends did. Some of the words they used were new to him, and some, he knew, were such as his mother would not wish him to say, but, all the same, they were nice boys and he was having fun—oh, yes, he was having fun, although he could not help that uncomfortable feeling, that sense of wrong-doing which made it impossible for him to enjoy himself as much as he had expected to "around the corner."

At last someone suggested playing Indian. John joined with enthusiasm. They chased each other up and down, giving the wildest war whoops.

"We must have a Pale Face," exclaimed one of the bigger boys, then added, exultantly, "John shall be the Pale Face."

"Yes, yes," shouted the others, and then they all ran for John, brandishing sticks for tomahawks and giving savage yells.

It was all fun still, but when they at last captured the "'Pale Face" and danced around him poking and slapping at him with their sticks, John began to think it was not quite so much fun. Some of the slaps were not fun at all, and John began to holler to them to stop.

"Oh, that's the game! Don't be a coward," cried one of the bigger boys.

"Pale Faces are always cowards," shouted another.

With that the boys attacked him with renewed ardor.

"Put him in prison," suggested one.

With one accord the boys surrounded John, dragging and pulling him over to the spot where stood a large ash barrel.

"That's the prison. Hustle him in."

In spite of John's cries of remonstrance, he was lifted bodily off his feet and dumped not too gently into the big, dirty ash barrel. It was too high for him to get over the side. He was a prisoner in truth.

In vain he battered against the walls of his prison and called to the boys to let him out. They had broken loose now and there was no controlling them. They danced around the barrel, shouting and yelling, and brandishing their "tomahawks." Their voices drowned John's cries.

"We'll never let you out," taunted one, enjoying John's terror to the full.

"We'll roll you down the street," suggested another.

John was thoroughly frightened now. He cried. He begged to be taken out. He pushed the big barrel until it swayed now this side, now that, but the boys still surrounded it.

"Don't let the prisoner escape," they cried.

Just then there was a cry, "The cop!"

With one accord the besieging army took to their heels.

John, with a mighty push, upset the barrel and crawled quickly out, covered with dirt and ashes, tearstained and gasping, just as a big policeman came up.

"What are you boys up to now?" he demanded, severely. "Upsetting ashes all over the street and breaking folks' barrels," then he stopped seeing John's face and his evident distress.

"You don't belong here, do you?" he asked, in surprise. Then he added, "What is your mother thinking of to let you play with those young ruffians—the worst boys on the whole beat. They're always into some mischief or other."

Between his sobs, John explained.

"Well, you go home," advised the big officer, kindly, "and if I were you I would mind my mother after this and not play around the corner any more."

"I won't. Indeed, I won't," exclaimed John, emphatically.

The policeman helped him brush off his clothes and walked with him to the corner, standing there until he saw John safely at his own door.

John's mother had returned and was standing on the doorstep looking anxiously up and down the street for him. John, tearstained, his clothes still showing traces of ashes and dirt, flung himself into his mother's arms, sobbing.

It was some time before he could tell her the whole story. She listened quietly and then said, gently,

"What do you think we would better do now?"

"I suppose I will have to go to bed. I know I've been a very bad boy," said John, repentantly.

"I think you will," said mother, as she kissed him, "and I am sure you will never go around the corner to play again, will you?"

"No, indeed," promised John as sobbing anew, he slowly removed his clothes and climbed into bed until the next day. It was a long hard punishment, but, "I guess mothers know best, after all."

A soft impulse, a sudden dream—
And life as dry as desert dust
Is fresher than a mountain stream.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

E. P. Gish is holding a revival meeting for his home congregation in Concord.

Bismark Church held a two weeks' revival meeting, adding two to the membership of the church.

J. T. McMahan, who is pastor of the new East End Church, Quincy, is holding a revival meeting for his home congregation.

Saunemin Church is to have the services of J. V. Coombs and Ralph C. Varner in a revival meeting, beginning this month.

S. E. Fisher, of Dixon, has declined a call to the pulpit of the Blackwell, Okla., church. Mr. Fisher's action was taken at the urgent request of his officers and congregation.

First Church, Bloomington, Edgar DeWitt Jones, pastor, will celebrate its seventy-fifth anniversary next spring.

Howett Street Church, Peoria, held its second annual meeting recently and reported a membership of 180 against 120 a year ago.

Bowen Church, over which C. R. Gains recently became pastor, is to have a revival meeting beginning the first of the year, lead by F. A. Sword.

There have been six additions to the DuQuoin Church in recent weeks, under the ministry of Charles E. Smith, the new pastor.

The congregation at Mount Morris, Illinois, has extended a call to become pastor to W. T. Hacker of Columbus, Illinois, which has been accepted.

J. F. Smith, minister of Ursa Church, is leading his congregation in a revival meeting, in which there were two additions at the outset.

C. E. French will hold a meeting at Bolivia Mission Point, his services being contributed by the congregation at Tallula, where he is pastor.

There were three additions at the regular Sunday service of the Mill Shoals Church on a recent Sunday. Two of these were by confession. The pastor is B. S. Kello.

The Litchfield meeting, where Charles W. Ross, the pastor, was assisted by Roy L. Brown, was concluded with fourteen additions, eight being on profession of faith.

Oliver W. Jennings, who has been preaching at Granite City for two years, has been invited by the congregation to continue his pastorate at an increased salary.

Mechanicsburg Church has employed O. P. Wright, of Decatur, for the ensuing year. Mr. Wright has been pastor of a Decatur Church for five years.

At Potomac, the edifice has been undergoing some repairs succeeding a meeting held by the pastor, E. M. Norton, in which there were fifteen additions, fourteen being by confession of faith.

Evangelist Mrs. Clara H. Hazelrigg, with Verda Phinney, held a revival meeting at Adrian, in which there were thirty-one additions mostly on profession of faith, nearly all adults. The pastor is E. W. Kellion.

Robert E. Henry held a meeting lasting two weeks for his home congregation at Niantic, in which there were fifteen additions, all of them being adults. The congregation here is prospering in every way.

At Chambersburg, where Gilbert W. Zink is pastor, a two weeks' meeting was concluded, in which there were twelve additions on profession of faith. Mr. Zink has recently become pastor of this church.

The revival at Carlinville has already accomplished much good and added six to the membership. J. W. Porter, minister, is doing the preaching and Guy B. Williamson of Waverly, is leading the music.

The revival meeting at Princeton, conducted by Evangelists Vawter and Marty, resulted in forty-six additions. Mr. Vawter has been asked by the congregation to return next year for a meeting. The pastor here is Cecil C. Carpenter.

Stuart Street Church, Springfield, of which H. H. Jenner is the pastor, has received about thirty additions in a meeting with John R. Golden of West Side Church, Springfield, preaching. The meeting is continuing.

The pastor of McLeansboro Church, H. H. William, was the recipient of a surprise party at his home on the occasion of his birthday. In addition to the fraternal greetings, he was presented with a chair for his study.

The church at Murphysboro is pastorless since the resignation of J. T. Sweatt, who is residing in DuQuoin to engage in business. It is learned that Mr. Sweatt is ready to devote his Sundays to preaching for churches in the vicinity of his home town.

Roy A. Miller, pastor at Rock Falls, writes jubilantly of breaking the record for Sunday-school attendance with 130 present and sixty-five Bibles. They expected to win a Front Rank pennant the next Sunday. The C. E. is also flourishing in this church.

A new District Evangelist has been secured for the Fifth District. Charles D. Hougham is the man, and will begin his work January 1. Mr. Hougham will make his residence in Springfield, and from that point will carry on his evangelistic labors. He has recently been residing at Arrowsmith.

Centralia meeting, conducted by the pastor, A. L. Huff, closed with eighty-seven additions. Mr. Huff was assisted by E. C. Tuckerman as chorister. It is said that this church has probably enjoyed no more satisfactory meeting than the one just concluded by the pastor.

First Church, Bloomington, recently suffered the loss of one of its most valued members and officials in the death of Mr. J. O. Willson. His departure is felt as a community misfortune as well as by the church. In the prime of life, with promise of years and strength he underwent an operation from which he did not recover. Many friends through Central Illinois have learned of his going with sincere regret.

Education Day in Illinois.

Education Day has been observed in Illinois since 1904. That year sixty churches gave $308.10. For the first six years less than 100 churches observed the day. In 1907, ninety churches fell in line, but in 1908-09 the number dropped to fifty-six and fifty-eight respectively. In 1910, 103 churches observed the day, with a total offering of $1,460.61. Last year 150 churches observed the day, with a total offering of $1,758.81. We ought to have at least 200 churches in line with us this year, and we are confident that this will be the case. It takes time to build up a work of this kind. But we are perfectly willing to be patient, that we may get our college work before the Brotherhood in the proper manner.

Education Day in Illinois is observed in the interest of Eureka College, under the direction of the Illinois Christian Educational Association. The field secretary is Luceba E. Miner, Bone Gap, Ill. In addition to my work as endowment secretary, I do the office work of the I. C. E. A. as corresponding secretary. There are four ways in which an individual or church can help the college through this association. 1. By becoming an annual member, paying $1 a year February 1. 2. By becoming a life member, paying $25 cash, or in five equal annual payments. 3. By becoming a Living Link, by the payment of $100. 4. By taking an offering on Education Day or by sending a gift to the college for the general fund any time during the year. There are 100 life members now and the number is increasing. We had the largest number of Living Links last year in the history of the association. The following churches were Living Links: Carlock, Clinton, Eureka, Jacksonville, Peoria, Shelbyville and Sullivan.

Church Life

Lowell C. McPherson is holding a meeting at Haverhill, Mass.

Leon V. Stiles reports an addition of twenty-five persons to the membership of the church at Miles City, Mont.

George B. Evans has resigned at Chagrin Falls, O., to accept the pastorate at North Tonawanda, N. Y.

Morton L. Rose, late of North Yakima, Wash., has accepted the pastorate of Colfax, Ia., church.

J. Will Walters, of Nevada, Mo., can be secured for a meeting between now and March 1.

W. J. Minges closed a meeting at Portage La Prairie, Manitoba, with 648 added. He is now in a meeting at Junction City, Kan.

Frank Thompson and the church at Bristol, Va., wil observe the opening of his new pastoral year by calling the roll of the 154 members received during the past year.

An interesting item from Bolenge, Africa, reads like home doings. It says a new brick church is nearing completion. Another item says the evangelists have just returned and report some 300 inquirers. The harvest truly is white (!) in that land.

C. C. Wilson, pastor First Church, Milwaukee, recently gave way at a Sunday evening service to Byron C. Piatt of Indianapolis, who lectured on "The Bible and Modern Life." The Netz Sisters' quartette sang for First Church that morning.

C. A. Donaldson of Indiana, entered upon his work at Ridgewood Heights Church, New York City, Nov. 5. He is getting the work splendidly together and the outlook is promising for a profitable work under his leadership.

Sterling Place Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., held its thirty-sixth anniversary service Nov. 19. On that day there were six additions, all adults, four confessions. Seven additions previously, not reported. M. M. Amunson is the enthusiastic pastor.

At the union revival meetings being held in Warren, O., it is the custom of Central and Second Disciple churches to hold early communion service in their new houses of worship, march to a common meeting point and unitedly enter the tabernacle for the 11 o'clock service. They have over 1,000 in line some Sundays. F. N. Calvin and F. W. Brown are the pastors.

Carey E. Morgan, of Paris, Ky., assisted Peter Ainslie at the Christian Temple, Baltimore, in a most profitable meeting of little more than two weeks. There were more than fifty added to the church and all were stirred to holier living. "His sermons and his presence," says Doctor Ainslie, "were constant blessings and gave us experiences long to be remembered."

The church at Marion, Ind., has just closed its second evangelistic campaign within a year with Snively-Marks as evangelists. There were over one hundred in the first meeting and seventy-four in the one just closed. There have now been over three hundred additions to the church in the pastorate of J. P. Myers begun one year ago last September.

Professor M. E. Bogarte, of Valparaiso University, passed away Nov. 17. He was for twenty years the teacher of a Sunday-school class in the Valparaiso Christian Church, numbering nearly 400 persons. After attending a reception given by his class he went home to be taken by death that night. There was not a moment's warning. Claude E. Hill, his pastor, says what all who knew him approve: "He was a mighty man, and our people did not have a greater teacher."

The trustees of William Woods College, Fulton, Mo., wish the brotherhood to be assured that they realize the importance of the responsibility that has fallen to them since the death of President J. B. Jones. They feel Mr. Jones' loss greatly, but testify to the substantial character of his work by saying that he left the school so well organized in faculty and business administration that its work will not be interrupted. A successor to Mr. Jones is being sought for the presidency. W. E. Jameson, president of the board of trustees, writes that he feels that the choice of a new head is a matter of as great importance to the church as to the school itself.

W. D. Van Voorhis, pastor at Parkersburg, W. Va., highly commends the work of G. W. Moore, of Ionia, Mich., who has just closed a four weeks' meeting for him. He says, "His message was sometimes startling in its newness. He took the church back to its Founder where he kept it night after night, learning again the lessons of the kingdom. Mr. Moore has none of the tricks of sensational evangelism. He is content to preach the gospel and let the Lord add to the church those who are being saved. While a devoted student of the Word of God he is thoroughly in sympathy with men of the present century through whom God is pleased to reveal his will. His ringing messages find a response in the heart of modern men and women." C. A. Hanna, pastor at Marietta, O., conducted the singing. Mr. Van Voorhis looks forward with great hope to a new year's work.

Oklahoma Christian University announces its purpose to accept a club of twenty or more young inexperienced students for the ministry, giving them board, room rent and tuition for the school year for $100. The university is seeking to find twenty churches, or individuals, who will each furnish $100 to support one of these young men. This $100 is intended to cover all expenses, except incidental fees of $6, books, clothing, etc. It is expected that some of the churches will allow the young men that they support to stay with them during the summer as assistant pastors, and in this way pay back the $100. President E. V. Zollars writes that he wishes this club to be started at the opening of the winter term. There are certain simple qualifications for admission on these terms which will be explained by writing directly to the president at Enid, Okla.

An annex will be built to Hyde Park Church, Kansas City, to be used as a boys' gymnasium and for meetings of the adult Bible classes. At a dinner given by the women of the church last week to the Men's Club of the church, $2,400 was subscribed for building the annex. Much of the inspiration for this enterprise comes from the activities of the Men and Religion Forward Movement. A recent meeting was held in the church in which were discussed certain civic projects proposed by the board of public welfare. This church is alive to the social claim of the gospel.

Hiram College observed the eightieth anniversary of the birth of former President James A. Garfield last Sunday. Mr. Garfield having been one of Hiram's presidents, it was thought best that the institution should take the initiative in honoring the martyred president, this being the first public recognition of the day. Two services were held, one in the Christian Church of which the late Mr. Garfield was a member while residing in Hiram, and the other in the college chapel. Hon. Thomas W. Phillips of New Castle, Penn., who was an associate politically of the former president, was present and delivered a memorial address. Professor B. S. Dean of the Hiram faculty who enjoys the distinction of once having been Mr. Garfield's instructor also spoke. The two Garfield sons, Messrs. James R. and Abram Garfield were present.

P. J. Rice, of El Paso, Tex., First Church, recently preached a sermon on "The Religion of the Mind" in which he dealt out both appreciation and criticism of Christian Science. The address was generously reported in the newspapers and the Christian Scientists of the city officially thanked him for the spirit of fairness with which the sermon was actuated. The following paragraph indicates the discriminating character of the address: "In dealing with such subjects it is well for us to keep close to well recognized scientific facts. One need not discredit his five senses. He need not lend himself to the acceptance of foolish vagaries of fantastic minds, he need not accept philosophies formulated by people untrained in logic and in science, nor psychological theories that discredit all we have ever learned, in order to accept the truth that bodily conditions are largely under the control of the mind."

H. C. Kendrick, more than five years minister at Georgetown, Ky., has resigned to take effect January 1. During his ministry in Georgetown more than three hundred members have been added to the congregation. For the last three years the church has been a Living Link in the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Prior to Mr. Kendrick's pastorate the largest offering made to Foreign Missions was $125. For the past two years the C. W. B. M. has been a Life Line, and in other missionary enterprises the congregation has enjoyed similar growth. Recently, the congregation expended more than $3,000 in repairing their most excellent building, making it entirely adequate to the needs of the various organizations. The Georgetown congregation has been served by such pastors as Barton W. Stone, "Raccoon" John Smith, and John T. Johnson. It will be remembered that it was in Georgetown,

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

Your Friend-- The Christian Century

When you think of your friends to whom you wish to make Christmas presents, do not forget your constant and intimate friend—The Christian Century.

We feel so secure in your affection that we make bold to suggest what gift would please us most. We do not ask you to buy anything for us. But if you would devote a little of your time and get a list of new subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY it would please us more than any other thing.

And this is a gift in which we could reciprocate. Your own paper would be more valuable to you; and your friends whose subscriptions you received—think how they would be benefitted throughout the year!

Christmas time offers an ideal opportunity for all the friends of The Christian Century who have on many occasions expressed their appreciation in words to express it in a practical deed. You can help make a greater paper, if you will. Begin to talk with your friends now.

If you send a list of five or more you may have a good commission on each new subscription.

E. W. Bowers is in a good meeting with First Church, Springfield, Mo.

J. M. Kersey of Omaha is conducting a meeting at Beatrice, Neb.

The new house of worship at Boise City, Idaho, was dedicated Sunday, Nov. 19.

Second Church, Detroit, Mich., held the first services in their new building, Nov. 19.

M. S. Johnson, who retires from the pastorate of First Church, McAlester, Okla., Dec. 1, will immediately take charge of the church at Haileyville.

Alabama state convention was held at Birmingham last week, presided over by A. R. Moore of that city. D. P. Taylor was elected president for the coming year.

Claris Yeuell, who has ministered at Paulding, Ohio., for the past two years, tendered his resignation. He will be open for a new engagement by January.

B. F. Cato of Lawrenceville, Ill., has been called to the church at Bowling Green, Ky. Mr. Cato is one of Illinois' best pastors. It is likely he will accept the call.

Frank M. Dowling is filling the pulpit of First Church, Los Angeles, Calif., until the arrival of Russell F. Thrapp, who goes from Jacksonville, Ill., Dec. 10, to assume charge.

Myron C. Settle, for five years state superintendent of Kansas Sunday-schools, will enter upon his new work as head of the Sunday-school organization of Ohio, January 1.

Central Church, Youngstown, O., W. D. Ryan, pastor, is projecting a new building. The growing Sunday-school is the prime occasion of this advance move. They recently had an attendance of close to 1,000.

W. T. Brooks closed a good meeting at Dodge City, Kan., with seventy-four added. One of the good results was the increase of current expense pledges by $714 for the year. This is substantial gain.

Girls of high school age in the Christian Church of Berkeley, Calif., presented their own dramatization of Henry van Dyke's "The Lost Word," in the church auditorium recently. They were trained by Mrs. H. J. Loken, talented wife of the pastor of Berkeley Church.

H. O. Breeden, who has been engaged in evangelistic work since leaving Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., five years ago, has accepted the pastorate of the church at Fresno, Calif. His coming to that community has stirred the people to a hearty welcome for him. He held evangelistic meetings there some time since and is much beloved.

E. A. Ewell, pastor of First Church, Beaumont, Tex., delivered an address at the regular weekly meeting of the Beaumont Trades Assembly, on the "Initiative, Referendum and Recall." Mr. Ewell is a strong supporter of this new movement in government. He was formerly a member of the Oklahoma legislature and is equipped to give a comprehensive and intelligent exposition of this subject.

The call extended to R. N. Simpson, of New Albany, Ind., by Central Church, Cincinnati, of which mention was made recently in these columns, was declined. Mr. Simpson had intended accepting the Cincinnati pulpit, but was compelled to refuse because of the urgent appeal of his present congregation, who increased his salary to an amount equal to that offered by the Cincinnati church. Central Church will continue its efforts to secure a pastor, the pulpit having been vacant for many months.

The Best

Did you know that the Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 will be in The Life of Christ? That means that you will want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition is now being prepared to meet the great demand expected this fall. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

Death of O. W. Lawrence

Startling news of the sudden death of O. W. Lawrence who removed from Decatur, Ill., to North Yakima, Wash., only four weeks ago, comes to this office as we are making ready for the press. Mr. Lawrence had been ill since August when he was stricken with pleural-pneumonia but it was believed that his convalescence was permanent. He was able to preach during his last few Sundays in Decatur and, though weak, was insistent in taking up his new work in the west without a rest. He leaves a wife—the daughter of Dr. W. B. Craig, of Redlands, Calif., and four young children. His taking off is inexpressibly sad. No ministry among the Disciples has been richer in the priceless goods of Christ than his. He was pastor at Baxter, Ia., during college days at Drake University, then at Maryville, Mo., Rock Island, Ill., and Decatur. In each of these fields he labored about five years and was beloved with singular affection. An editorial appreciation of Mr. Lawrence will appear later.

A Revival in Iowa City

About seven years ago, Herbert Moninger held a meeting in Iowa City, with about 100 additions. Five years ago, C. C. Morrison conducted a short series of meetings also. Nearly four years ago the writer became pastor of this church, since which time there has been no extended evangelistic effort until now.

On Tuesday evening, November 21, we closed a meeting of exactly a month's duration, conducted by Evangelist Wm. J. Lockhart, of Des Moines, assisted by W. F. Lintt and C. R. Travist, singing evangelists of Lincoln, Neb. This meeting greatly stirred our whole community.

Our church building became inadequate to accommodate the people desiring to attend almost at once, so a tabernacle accommodating 1,000 people was hastily constructed and moved into. Here many people came to hear the gospel who had not been to church for years.

Iowa City is the seat of the State University of Iowa. The churches here, as is often the case in such centers, are charged with neglecting the town needs in order to capture university people. We attempted little for the students, but by means of the tabernacle definitely reached out for the town. And it responded to us. The "bum" element, whom we of course attacked, damned us roundly. But altogether 167 responded to the invitation, most of whom were from the ordinary walks of life.

Some of the most significant results of this meeting are first, the confidence it has inspired in the church that it has large capacity for religious work. Secondly, the inspiration it has received to become genuinely and continuously evangelistic. Thirdly, the fine spirit of union it everywhere cherished. Though our membership now is but little more than 400, we are pledging ourselves to increase the membership to 500 by Easter time, and are organizing ourselves for Bible study and personal work for this achievement.

All the churches had representatives who were active in these meetings, and they acknowledge themselves great gainers thereby. An old resident here, a lay preacher in the Methodist Church, declared this the most "union" meeting he ever saw. Mr. Lockhart is eminently fitted to carry on union evangelistic services.

This church, including its minister, is most grateful for the blessings that have come out of this campaign.

Iowa City. CARLOS C. ROWLISON.

The Situation in China

The work of the Foreign Society is done in Central China. That is the center of the greatest disturbance at the present time, though all parts of China are disturbed more or less. Nanking is on the Yangtse River and is about two hundred miles from the sea. Because of its strategic position Nanking was once the capital of the Empire. At the present time Nanking is held by the Imperial troops. Their strongest fortifications are on the Purple Mountain, just outside of the walls. The Revolutionists are massing their forces so as to attack the Imperialists in and around Nanking.

The dispatches state that all foreigners, with two or three exceptions, have left Nanking. Some have gone to Shanghai and some have gone to Wuhu, fifty miles up the river from Nanking.

The Imperial troops and the Revolutionists are supposed to protect foreigners as far as that is in their power. At the present time the Chinese are fighting, not to exclude the foreigners, as was the case in the Boxer uprising, but to break the power of the Manchu dynasty.

There is every reason to believe that the missionaries are all safe, though they may have been inconvenienced more or less by sudden flight. There is very little danger of loss of life or property, though the buildings may suffer some from the bombarding. If the missionaries were in any real distress they woud have cabled to the Mission Rooms in Cincinnati. One cable was received two weeks ago, but nothing since. Shanghai is in the hands of the Revolutionists. The people who are there are perfectly secure. Those who have relatives and friends in China need not feel any alarm.

New York is the Greatest Toy Market

New York is by far and away the world's largest toy market. The annual volume of trade at wholesale prices is $75,000,000 and of this a large part is shipped out of the country, mainly to the great fairs of Europe and Asia.

In mechanical toys and in toys made of iron, tin, lead and brass, New York has ranked first as the world's largest market for twenty years. More recently the local toy interest has branched out in building wooden toy making factories in the lumbering regions, where much of the refuse from sawmills makes fine stock for toymakers and can be obtained at such low prices that European makers of wooden toys cannot compete against the larger producers of American wooden toys who push trade throughout Europe and Asia.

There are 9,583 live patents issued by foreign nations to New York makers of mechanical and other toys. This assures a good market for those toys in countries which possess 250,000,000 children.

Exports of toys from that city begin to be large in July, and the trade holds out until late in October, when all large consignments for the great marts of Europe must be forwarded to meet requirements for Christmas and New Year trade. There are now residing in New York City about 125 Indians who do fine work in basketry and beadwork and in

By Professor Herbert L. Willett

PART I, FROM MOSES TO ELISHA

This is the first of four parts, which will cover the entire field of prophetic activity in the Old Testament. In the present issue there are thirteen sections, as follows:

THE PROPHETS AND THE OLD TESTAMENT.
THE BEGINNINGS OF PROPHETIC WORK.
MOSES AND ISRAEL.
MOSES AND THE BEGINNINGS OF THE NATION.
THE RISE OF SAMUEL
SAMUEL, JUDGE AND PROPHET.
DAVID AND NATHAN.
AHIJAH OF SHILOH
ELIJAH AND THE PROPHETS OF BAAL.
ELIJAH, DEFENDER OF POPULAR RIGHTS.
ELISHA, THE PASTOR OF ISRAEL
THE REFORMS OF ELISHA.
THE PROPHETS OF THE JUDEAN SCHOOL.

These studies and those that follow in the series have been in use in many Sunday-schools during the past year, in the weekly form in which they have appeared in The Christian Century. This first part is now thoroughly revised and published in convenient form for class work or private use.

It contains ninety-two pages, is bound in paper, and is sold at thirty-five cents the copy.

toys to the order of local toy trade factories.

Rag dolls, all made by women and girls in that city, are sold in all countries. A Brooklyn woman who a few years ago began making rag dolls for one retail toyshop now employs 300 girls in her factory and farms out work to 500 women in and around new York. A Harlem woman who originated negro dolls handsomely dressed for sale to well to do colored families has built up a national business and has found a good market through local toy exporters to North Africa, where many kinds of American toys are distributed by caravans over enormous trading zones.

A factor in making American toys popular in Europe in recent years is the large number of gifts of toys sent from here by fathers, brothers, or sisters of the little Germans, Russians, Poles, Austrians or Italians. There are many imitations of domestic toys in Europe, but the majority of buyers prefer the genuine American made toys, which while they cost a little more than the imitation products are far better in quality and last longer. New York city has become the world's great toy market mainly because it is also a great manufacturing centre for many kinds of wares that have remnants and odds and ends which furnish the material that enters into millions of toys.—New York Sun.

The Story of Judson's Bible

Twenty years after Adoniram Judson reached Burma the New Testament was translated into the Burmese tongue. In 1824, when war was waged between England and Burma, Mr. Judson was thrown into prison, and Mrs. Judson buried the precious manuscript, just ready for the printer, in the earth beneath their house. But as mold was gathering upon it, on account of the dampness caused by heavy rains, with a woman's ready wit, she sewed the treasure inside a roll of cotton, put on a cover, and took it to the jail to be used by Mr. Judson as a pillow.

In nine months he was transferred to the inner prison, where five pairs of fetters were put upon his ankles, and it was announced that he, with a hundred others, fastened to a bamboo pole, were to be killed before morning. During this terrible night, much prayer ascended for the precious pillow. It had fallen to the share of the keeper of the prison, but Mrs. Judson, producing a better one, induced him to exchange.

Mr. Judson was not killed, but hurried away to another place, and again the pillow was his companion. But one of the jailers untied the mat that served as its cover and threw the roll of cotton into the yard as worthless. Here a native Christian, ignorant of its value, found and preserved it as a relic of his beloved master, and with him months afterward its contents were discovered intact. After the close of the war this New Testament was printed, and in 1834 the whole Bible was translated into the Burmese language—a language peculiarly difficult on account of its construction and curious combinations.—Stories of Bible Translation.

Facts for Thanksgiving Reflections

The annual report of the Isthmian Canal Commission has just been made public. The record of the year's achievements in the gigantic task that is being worked out by the Washington government under Congressional appropriations that so far aggregate $293,561,486, includes: Completion of almost three-quarters of Culebra Cut. Total excavation of material from Culebra during the year, 16,221,672 yards, at average cost of 58.8 cents per yard. Big plans laid for canal terminals, including storage of fuel, fresh water and other supplies, repair facilities, etc. Pacific terminal to have dry dock, store house and coaling stations. Practical completion of plans of all locks. Elaborate scheme for lighting the canal. Safeguarding of the canal against big landslides. The total appropriations made by Congress leave $81,639,531 of the estimated cost of the canal yet to be appropriated. For the first time no contract laborers were brought to the isthmus during the year. There was a decided falling off in immigration, while many West Indian laborers have gone into the bush and can no longer be relied upon for steady work.

The alarmists who have been raising the cry that the colored race will outnumber the white race before long in this country, are assured by the census bureau that there is no danger of any such thing taking place at present. A report says: The white population of the United States is increasing at a much greater proportional rate than the negro population. When the census was taken in 1910, the white population was 88.9 per cent of the total population, whereas the negro population was only 10.7 per cent of in total. In 1900 the whites formed 86.5 per cent of the total, and the negroes 13.1 per cent. Excluding Alaska, Porto Rico, and the outlying possessions, the total population of the United States at the last census was 91,972,266, of which 81,732,687 were whites, 9,828,294 negroes, and 411,285 Indians, Chinese and Japanese and other non-Caucasian races. The increase in the white population since 1900 was 14,923,491, or 22.3 per cent, as compared with an increase of 994,300, or 11.3 per cent of the negro population. The excess in the increase of whites is due in part to immigration.

Andrew Carnegie, true to his word last week, turned over $25,000,000 to the Carnegie corporation of New York, the body which was incorporated by the legislature on June 9 of the present year, for the purpose of taking over Mr. Carnegie's work in connection with educational institutions, libraries, and hero funds. The gift was in the form of 5 per cent first mortgage bonds of the United States Steel corporation, the value of the bonds being taken at par. The gift was worth about $656,250 more than the face value of the bonds. The income of which the incorporators will have the disposition is $1,250,000 a year. This $25,000,000 gift increases the total of Mr. Carnegie's gifts for various philanthropic purposes to far beyond the $200,000,000 mark.

has announced. The per capita consumption of beer in the United States was only 20.09 gallons in 1910, while in Belgium it was 55.2 gallons, in the United Kingdom 31.44 gallons and in Germany 26.47 gallons. Germany was second in the total consumption of beer and the United Kingdom third. In the consumption of wines, France leads with 39.36 gallons per capita.

A "divorce proctor," whose salary is to be paid from a fund raised by the reform organizations of Kansas City, to cope with the "divorce evil," has been installed. This office was created as a result of criticism of the divorce machinery of the county. Mismated persons taking advantage of it, have come to Kansas City from various points and have been granted separation on slight pretext and short residence. The proctor will have authority to summon witnesses, to go into other states and take depositions and to cross-examine witnesses at the trial here of persons who seek a legal separation. Judges, attorneys, and the reform leaders interested predict that the new office will become established generally. The Kansas State Bar association also has under consideration a plan to appoint proctors in the large cities of that state.

During the last fiscal year there were 1,648,033 employes upon the interstate railroads of the United States. One employe out of every 458 was killed, and one out of every thirteen injured. The total number of casualties during the year was 160,555, of which 10,396 were persons killed and 150,159 persons injured. Of those killed, 439 were classed as "industrial accidents," and those injured 79,237 were so classed. This classification covers those not involved in the movement of cars or engines on rails. During the year 5,287 persons were killed and 5,614 injured while trespassing on the property of railroads.

For the first time since 1883 the postoffice department during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, was conducted at a profit. In twenty-four months the conduct of the postal service has resulted in changing a deficit of $17,479,770 for the fiscal year 1909 to a surplus of $219,118 for the fiscal year 1911. During the last fiscal year the audited revenues of the department were $237,879,823, and the audited expenditures $237,648,926. During the year 81,906,025 domestic money orders were issued, aggregating $590,034,432 and 4,060,413 international money orders were issued, aggregating $96,681,211. More than $3,000,000 is held by the treasurer of the United States and assistant treasurers for the use of the postal service and more than $6,400,000 is similarly held for the use of the money order service.

The federal government's deficit for the current fiscal year exceeded $20,180,000 when the treasury opened its doors November 1. A year ago the deficit was $13,000,000 while a month ago it was $16,050,000. The total balance in the general fund of the treasury at the close of October was $136,520,000, as against $144,400,000 in September. The working balance in treasury offices at the opening of business Nov. 1 was $78,650,000, while a month ago it amounted to $89,115,000. The total cash in the treasury November 1 was $1,897,170,000, as compared with $1,886,510,000 at the end of September. The Panama canal called for an expenditure of $2,390,000 during October, making a total disbursement for this project during the current fiscal year of $11,555,000. There are 7,331 national banks in existence, an increase of two over September. The total amount of national bank circulation at the close of October was $739,165,000.

For Young People's and Adult Classes

The enthusiasm with which so many adult Sunday school classes have taken up the gospel of the Kingdom series this fall prompts us to present the outline of subjects for the entire year of 1912. The lessons come in the form of a monthly magazine—not quarterly, but monthly—at 50c a year. Dr. Josiah Strong is the editor of the series. Problems relating to men, women and the home are uppermost the coming year. The magazine is adapted to both men and women, whether young people or older folks. Send 5c in stamps for a single copy of the magazine.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The Graded Lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' and Primary Departments are fully completed. Three of the four Junior grades are complete. Fourth year Junior pupils may use either third year Junior lessons or first year Intermediate. Two of the four Intermediate grades are complete, and these materials may be used for the entire Intermediate Department. For Senior and Adult Departments, Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus" is provided. Other Adult classes may use Dr. Strong's "The Gospel of the Kingdom."]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

EVERY LESSON WRITER IS A RECOGNIZED AUTHORITY IN THE INTERDENOMINATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL WORLD!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that co-operation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

Faith in Some Else's Faith

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON somewhere declares that it is really disheartening how much we depend upon other people. He has in mind the industrial, material aspect of our life. Perhaps this discovery of the thorough-going social character of everything human was, at first, a cause of disheartenment. Men had so long shouted for independence, individual liberty, the rights of man, and so forth, that the discovery of the complete dependence of the individual upon the social order came as a sort of disillusionment.

But a second view of this dependence is today revealing the fact in a new aspect. In this new aspect it is not disheartening but inspiring. We are dependent, it is true, but it is only half the truth. The whole truth is that we are interdependent. These three words mark the highway along which the thinking world has traveled in the past one hundred and fifty years: Independence, Dependence, Interdependence.

It is not simply on the economic side of our life that we are part one of another but in the things of the mind and the soul we are all of us bound up together. It would surprise every soul of us, could we but take a cross-section of our spiritual experience, to discover how absolutely even our religion depends upon others. In the things of faith none of us liveth to himself. The root of our religion is always faith in some one else's faith, perhaps the inspiration of a mother's or a hero's faith, or the faith that has organized itself in the customs and institutions of the social order in which we live.

We do not approach the spiritual world through direct individual intuition.

"Pure faith indeed—you know not what you ask.
Naked belief in God . . . sears too much
The sense of conscious creatures to be borne.
It were the seeing Him no flesh shall dare."

God mediates himself to us through the contagion of other people's faith in Him. And so faith is essentially a social fact.

Just how true this is, is seen in the weakening of the moral life of a community by the downfall of trusted leaders. When a minister "goes wrong," or a trusted banker or a teacher of the young, the instinctive comment is: It almost makes one lose faith in God and man! On the other hand what a mighty bulwark to the faith of his fellows is the character of a faithful man! He stands like a dyke against the raging sea of doubt. He saves us all from cynicism and atheism. He does not save us by talking to us about faith but by himself being faithful. And this should teach us that faith is not proved but imparted, not taught but caught, not carried by logic but by love.

This contagious property of faith is the principle upon which the church rests. We need one another's faith in order to maintain and nourish our own. Faith withers without society. It is by common worship, the frank, simple interchange of life's experiences, and by co-operative service for others that our grasp on invisible, spiritual realities is made strong.

The act of prayer, which most of us would put down as perhaps the most individualistic act of religion, is intensified by human fellowship in the approach to God. Our own personal needs are interpreted to us in the lives and aspirations of others. Psychology as well as Scripture stands back of the injunction not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together. It is when two or three are gathered in his name that Christ is in the midst, because in that social situation each attains an expansion of personality of which he is incapable in isolation.

The study of the Bible is a means of grace, because it transmits to us the faith of the heroes of old who saw the invisible. We catch Abraham's faith and Paul's and Hosea's by reading their words and deeds. To come into communion with their great souls, and to possess ourselves of this faith of theirs is the essential value of Bible reading. To miss this is to miss all. One may know the words of Scripture never so accurately, but if no fire has been lighted in the reader's soul by the faith of the men in the Book, he has not read the word of God at all. To him, however orthodox his views, it is but a word of man. It is not the science in it, nor the history, nor even the theology, but the religion, the faith, that is the important content of holy scripture. It is primarily a book of life.

Nor need we hesitate to affirm that faith in Christ is, in the last analysis, faith in his faith. To believe in Jesus is not to believe something about him, but to have his personal faith for our own. The important thing to get from Jesus is not a doctrine of himself but his vision of God, his belief in man, his assurance that goodness is stronger than any other thing in the world, his scale of life's values.

What makes Jesus Christ the Saviour of the world is that there radiates from his faithful personality a contagion of faith throughout the social order of the world. We all feel the influence of this personality. He became the high priest of humanity because he was the one just and faithful soul among us. He stands at the very frontier of our world, the outermost dyke which God has built against the ocean of doubt. His faith forever keeps the objects of religion vivid and commanding for all mankind.

Let the cynic say in his haste, "All men are liars!" In his second thought he will see Jesus, and will have to take it back. The character of Christ, realizing as it does the loftiest ideal against the greatest odds, is the one fact which will forever hold the world back from the deep abyss of atheism. For he draws all men to himself and through his crystal faith all men see the Father.

Social Survey

The Resignation of A. J. Balfour.

The resignation of Arthur J. Balfour as leader of the minority, or Conservative party, in Great Britain, had it come immediately after the passage of the veto measure, would have occasioned little surprise. He was then bitterly attacked by the "last ditch" branch of his party, but at this hour his retirement created quite a sensation. As a contemporary puts it, just as the friends of Mr. Balfour thought they had silenced his antagonists and made it possible for him to continue as party chief he disconcerted every one by retiring not only from the leadership but from parliament altogether. There can be little doubt that his withdrawal was hastened by the bitter attacks made upon him by his own party. Mr. Balfour became prime minister in 1902 and immediately got into trouble by adopting a vacillating attitude toward the proposition of establishing a protective tariff in place of free trade. This lost for him the people's confidence and his party was thrice defeated at the polls, yet with wonderful tenacity he retained his leadership, though he was lacking in personal magnetism. Mr. Balfour saw the popular drift more clearly than did Lord Halsbury, and by permitting the Liberals to put through their veto bill without forcing them to the creation of the so-called "puppet lords," he incurred the opposition of the Halsbury, or "last-ditch," wing. However, advancing age, impaired health and a desire to commit the leadership into younger hands were the immediate and dominating reasons for the termination of his active leadership. In name his successor has been chosen by the Conservatives in the person of Andrew Bonar Law, a native Canadian who has been in parliament but eleven years. In reality the leadership of the whole Conservative party will now be divided between Mr. Law and Lord Lansdowne.

Dedication of the Lincoln Memorial.

Every patriotic heart in the United States will beat with satisfaction over the tribute paid to Abraham Lincoln in the dedication of the granite temple in his memory on the Kentucky farm on which he was born 102 years ago. It is estimated that, in order to witness the ceremonies, 10,000 people journeyed to the spot made sacred because of its association with him. The services were presided over by the president of the Lincoln Farm Association, Ex-Governor Folk, of Missouri. President Taft spoke on behalf of the nation; Governor Willson for his native state, Kentucky; Gen. John C. Black, ex-commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, for the soldiers of the North; and Gen. John B. Castleman for the southern veterans. Senator Borah, of Idaho, in a masterly manner presented "Lincoln the Man." This temple is distinctly the gift of the American people. Rich and poor alike shared the privilege of honoring the great President, for the gifts ranged from 80 cents from a family of eight to $25,000 from one rich man. In memory of one who, in the opinion of President Taft, had "the most judicial temperament of any man in history," and to all of us the greatest American lover of men, the little farm near Hodgenville is sacred to all America along with Mount Vernon. On the day previous to the dedication of the building, a statue of Lincoln was unveiled in the state capitol at Frankfort by President Taft.

After the Fall Elections.

The late election has given political leaders plenty to think about. Several disappointments, both pleasant and unpleasant for those truly interested in the welfare of the people, were recorded, yet on the whole there is cause for rejoicing. The fact that Republicans, Democrats, or Socialists were successful candidates in itself is of little general interest. But the fact that in so many instances the results indicate an unmistakable interest in, and desire for, a clean administration, and a real effort toward securing it by an intelligent selection of the more desirable candidates, irrespective of party affiliation, is significant. Philadelphia and Cincinnati exhibit the two most striking examples of this popular trend. The former has for many years been notoriously in the grip of "inexpressibly corrupt ward politics," and the election of Rudolph Blankenburg as the next mayor is a complete routing of the local ring. Mr. Blankenburg, long known as "the war-horse of reform," is a clean man of great courage and his mettle will be tested to its limit in the colossal task before him of purifying Philadelphia politics. In Cincinnati, the significant success was the defeat of George B. Cox as city "ward boss" by the opposition candidate for mayor, Henry T. Hunt. Cox is said to have reigned as a boss in that city longer than any other American politician in a similar position. For two years Hunt was county prosecuting attorney and waged a relentless fight against Cox which would have landed the latter in the penitentiary, it is openly alleged, but for his control of the judges of the county. Hunt then took his case and laid it before the people with a resulting big popular majority as a vindication. But aside from these and other lesser blows to "bossism," the strength developed by the Socialists is decidedly significant. The election of Rev. George R. Lunn as mayor, together with a large number of his colleagues to other offices in Schenectady, N. Y., was almost spectacular. Pitted against the Republican and Democratic candidates, he received a substantial plurality. A few other socialistic mayors elected are those of Lima, Salem, Lorain, St. Mary's, Barberton, Cuyahoga Falls, Mount Vernon, Toronto, Fostoria, Mansfield, and Martin's Ferry, Ohio; Crookston, Minn.; Newcastle, Pa.; and at Manti, Wilka, and Murray, Utah. In California the primaries show that a large percentage of the women will vote the Socialist ticket. Thus we will have an opportunity to determine the ameliorating properties of socialism for the ills of democratic government.

The Indigestion After European Diplomatic Party.

Although it appeared on the surface that the adjustment of the Morocco question between Germany and France was effected smoothly, if certain reports are to be accepted at their face value, it was a forced affair and Germany secured far less advantage than she expected when she forced the issue by sending her war vessels to Agadir. The truth is that each time Germany has interfered in Morocco, she has chosen opportune times when the friends of France were otherwise distracted and could not come to her rescue. This was particularly noticeable at the time of the Algeciras conference. Russia, then France's best ally, was facing her own troubles in the Far East, and the understanding with England was not as complete as it later became. Thus Germany was enabled to deal with France alone, much to her own advantage. Germany sought to catch France with the same strategy this time but apparently has overshot her mark. England dropped her internal struggle in a twinkle and stood loyally by her new ally, France, and Russia, having again caught her breath after the tussle with Japan, frowned threateningly upon the German policy. Confronted by trouble with three powers, Germany made haste to accept the conciliatory French conditions. Briefly, those conditions were the undisputed right of France to protectorate or dominion in Morocco for which France ceded to Germany strips of land in French Congo including river frontage of a mile or so on each of the rivers Congo and Oubangi. Now Germany is facing a political uprising due to popular indignation over the treaty. The German people feel they have been bested in the agreement and resent it. Even the crown prince opposes the policy of the kaiser, his father, and last week created a sensation by rising in his box in the Reichstag, the lower house of the German parliament, and endorsing several criticisms of the imperial policy. For this apparent indiscretion the prince, it is declared, was temporarily banished to Dantsic, his summer home. The kaiser inspired an editorial in the semi-official Kölnische Zeitung, which says in part: "We do not desire that the crown prince be prevented from expressing his opinion in a fitting manner and place, not, however, in the way chosen in the Reichstag, the effect of which we consider extremely grave." The French public seemed satisfied with the terms of the German treaty when they were made public, but recent reports say that France, too, is having internal trouble over the Morocco question. It is reported that a secret treaty with Spain, bearing on Morocco, has been uncovered, and the people are incensed, not so much over the text, it is said, but because it was so long kept a secret.

"Less than a week ago," said Professor Herbert Martin in addressing the Des Moines Ministers' Association, "the warden of one of our state penitentiaries told me of a conversation between two of the men in his charge. One asked the other, 'Why are you here?' The reply was, 'I held up a preacher.' 'How much did you get?' He answered, 'Fifty cents.' The other replied, 'You should not be here, you should be in an insane asylum.'"

Authority in Religion.

The advocates of an authority religion have always found difficulty in finding an unquestioned authority. Sabatier states this difficulty with power in his "Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit." We find one of our Presbyterian contemporaries, the Presbyterian Advance stating the issue as follows:

The Bible proves itself to be an infallible rule of faith and practice to all who undertake to follow it, and has so proved itself through all the ages, countless numbers of persons having found peace and joy and assurance of salvation through heeding its teachings. In his famous discussion with Eck, Martin Luther declared, "The Christian believer acknowledges no other authority than Holy Scripture," and this has always been the Protestant position. In its effort to maintain itself against the authority of an infallible church, Protestantism began to insist upon the authority of an infallible book in a way which obscured the distinction between the infallibility of the Word of God as contained in the Scriptures and the infallibility of the Scriptures as interpreted by a church. But this was a later development. The confident faith of the early reformers was not founded upon an infallible book, but upon "the experience of the religion of grace and justification by faith," which they had gained from Scripture. The theology of experience was boldly substituted for that of authority. Luther says: "Christ is the Master, the Scriptures are the servant. (Italics ours.) Here is the true touchstone for testing all the books: we must see whether they work the works of Christ or not. The book which does not teach Christ is not apostolic, were St. Peter or St. Paul its writer. On the other hand, the book which preaches Christ is apostolic, were its author Judas, Ananias, Pilate or Herod."

Moderator Carson's Views.

Rev. Dr. John F. Carson of Brooklyn, moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly this year, has just concluded a preaching tour that took him before the synods of Indiana, Missouri, Kansas, and Minnesota, and to Omaha, Denver, Spokane, Portland, Seattle, San Francisco, Salt Lake City, Kansas City, Birmingham and Nashville. On the tour he was accompanied by Rev. Dr. W. H. Foulks of New York, late of Portland, Oregon.

Aims of the tour, which is unusual for Presbyterian moderators to make, were three: (1) To show to Presbyterians, and especially to those of the Middle West, the Coast and the South, that the Presbyterian Church is national, not sectional; (2) To gain for the whole Church the views of an eastern man concerning Presbyterian conditions in the West. Heretofore the church has had only the testimonies and the judgments of western men concerning the West; (3) To visit western colleges in the interest of Christian education, to encourage such as need it, and to ascertain what help is essential to reinforce these institutions.

Returning from the tour the moderator says he finds Presbyterian churches, colleges and other institutions in the West, the South and on the Coast, to be still in need of assistance from the East, because Presbyterians in these newer localities are struggling to erect their necessary church foundations, their hospitals, and their colleges. The East has set standards which the West must equal. There is today a competition which the East did not have to meet at the time it built its churches and hospitals. Hence the need of assistance from the East while Presbyterians in the West are anchoring.

"Conditions in the West," thinks the moderator, "have wholly changed in fifteen years, as they have in the East. A decade and a half ago, certainly a quarter of a century ago, the Presbyterian Church, in common with others, was a field, and only in small measure a force. The concern of its members was to secure and to insure salvation. Such their purpose, they were in the churches on Sundays, and so-called church attendance was possible to be gauged.

"Today church members, and especially laymen, are engaged in many forms of religious effort, as missions, Y. M. C. A., brotherhoods, Christian Endeavor, Sunday-school and social service, and Presbyterianism is, like other bodies, a force rather than a field. Out at work as teachers and preachers, members are not in the churches, and church attendance on Sundays cannot be gauged. I am convinced," says the moderator, "after careful study of conditions West and East, in the South and on the Coast, that if there could be a line up, as there could be when people thought they did their whole duty by attending public worship in the churches, the showing would be far ahead of that of fifteen to twenty-five years ago. Things have not grown worse but better. The talk about decrease in church attendance comes from those who have not studied the real situation."

Vast Association Activities.

Speaking at the annual dinner of the International Y. M. C. A. Committee eleven heads of as many departments of work related achievements and needs of Associations of the United States and Canada at the moment. There are now 225 general secretaries, about equally divided between home and foreign work, and the International Committee expended last year, in running cost $600,000, of which nearly half went to foreign fields. For new buildings $5,000,000 has recently been secured, and closer co-operation is now assured between state and general committees.

In more than five hundred communities country work is carried on, aiming at community betterment, and co-operating with churches, schools, granges and farmers' institutes. There have recently been brought into touch with this line of work professors in theological seminaries, presidents of agricultural colleges, and United States Government experts in the Agricultural Department. There are 87,000 railroad men in Associations and 768 student Associations, chiefly in colleges and high grade schools, and these Associations are part of a world student movement having centers in thirty nations. There attend the thirty-five Associations at Army and Navy stations 7,000 enlisted men daily. Buildings at New York and Fortress Monroe are having to turn applicants away, at the last named as many as 20,000 a year who desire accommodations for longer or shorter periods. At San Francisco recently when $25,000 was available in the hands of enlisted men, having just been paid to them by the Government, $18,000 was deposited in Association safe keeping within an hour. Under the benefactions of a large hearted Jew, Mr. Julius Rosenwald, of Chicago, six new buildings for colored Associations are erecting, or will soon be begun.

In the new industrial department work is carried on among lumbermen, cotton mill operatives of New England and the South, metal miners and coal miners, and with immigrants, utilizing in the latter work students of many colleges, especially throughout the east. There are 180,000 boys and 300 secretaries caring for their interests. The physical training is advancing as it has done since its beginning. Recently, in one special campaign for the purpose, 30,000 men and boys were taught to swim.

In educational classes 65,000 employed men are enrolled, and in all of the educational work of all Associations' tuition fees amounting to the large total of $528,000 were paid last year. The Men and Religion campaign represents the religious Association work, which covers both individual and social service. The foreign work now touches Japan, Korea, China, the Philippine Islands, Ceylon, India, Russia, Turkey and its dependencies, Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, Brazil, Mexico and the West Indies. Association property values are now $57,000,000, and the whole enrollment of members nearly 600,000.

Congregational

Hindrances to Church Attendance.

The lack of audiences in many churches is to be accounted for by more fundamental causes than we have been prone to consider. The student of the present social situation finds many causes operating against the growth of religion. The Congregationalist which is ever on the alert with regard to the social tendencies of the present time, quotes with approval from the Survey as follows:

It seemed to me that there was something significant in the fact that the Congregational church in Southeastern Lackawanna was not holding Sunday morning services; that the pastor of the Methodist church did not reside in Lackawanna, but made his living in business in Buffalo, coming out on Sundays to preach; that the pastor of the Presbyterian church was adding to the area within which his voice might be heard by editing a weekly newspaper; and that even the Catholic churches could not depend on their members observing the rites of the church. I asked the pastors of two of the Protestant churches and the priest of the American Catholic church about it. They all said the same thing—that the long hours and Sunday work of the steel mills are fatal to spiritual growth. The Congregational church suspended its morning services because its male members are either at work, or in bed after a night of work, at the time for beginning Sunday morning services.

"It is a calamity to a community," said one of the churchmen, "to have a steel plant built in its midst, for steel is made in America today under conditions ruinous to health and morals."

Failures and Victories of the Church in the War Against Rum

The church and the liquor dealer appeal to science for testimony in behalf of their theories. The liquor man would have us believe that the drinking of intoxicating beverages is necessary to the health and happiness of the nation. The representative of the church announces that abstinence is the way of national salvation. The liquor man has on his side ancient prejudice and custom. He is able to speak convincingly to multitudes simply because they demand confirmation of their views and approval of their practices. The advocate of abstinence may be prejudiced, but his prejudice lacks the support of appetite and greed. The testimony of science is becoming more and more favorable to his view.

A common designation of whiskey is "snake medicine." This designation indicates that whiskey has been thought to be a cure for snake-bite. Now high medical authorities declare that the belief in the efficacy of whiskey in cases of snake-bite is another of the delusions of which men are the willing victims. Dr. S. Weir Mitchell is quoted by the Sunday-school Times as saying: "Many men have been killed by the alcohol given them to relieve them from the effects of snake-bite, and it is a matter of record that men dead drunk with whiskey, and then bitten, have died of the bite." Dr. J. H. Kellogg says: "Alcohol lessens the resistance of the patient, weakens the heart, and helps along the prostration which is the characteristic effect of rattlesnake venom."

The Thirteenth International Congress against alcoholism was held at The Hague in September, 1911. This fact is significant. The war against alcoholism is not a local uprising. The liquor question cannot be settled by one nation. If alcohol is a poison, men everywhere ought to know it. Men of science and philanthropists of all races and creeds are uniting to fight the evils of alcoholism. When the liquor dealer points to Germany as an example of a drinking nation that is foremost in science and trade, the church can name distinguished German scientists who pronounce beer a curse to Germany. These scientists give the facts, too. They have not spoken hastily, but after patient and careful research.

Whenever any person or organization undertakes to improve the condition of any class of unfortunates, the discovery is apt to be made that the liquor business is in the way. Homer Folks, secretary of the State Charities Aid Association of New York, writing in the Review of Reviews, says: "The State Charities Aid Association and the other organizations engaged in the prevention of insanity are not temperance societies. They were not formed in the first instance by people who were practically interested in the temperance question, or, if so interested, that interest found expression in other directions. The time has come, however, when every person desirous of promoting the health and happiness of his fellowmen and preventing disease, and especially the great scourges of tuberculosis and insanity, must join hands in furthering whatever methods stand the test of practicability for the purpose of stopping the exploitation of the weakness of human beings for profit. Let us recognize once for all that liquors are not made to be drunk but to be sold, and that the most difficult problem of temperance is not the man who wants to drink but the man who wants to sell drinks."

In a discussion of the recommendations of The Hague Congress, a writer in The Survey thus sums up the opinions of the papers read: "Three conclusions are significantly common to nearly all the papers, namely: the problem of the drunkard is not the ultimate alcohol problem but one that, since it exists, must be handled more efficiently and intelligently than heretofore; abstinence is required in any method; and education of the drinker, his family, and society at large as to the facts involved is essential." So it is becoming clear that the poor wretch who is the laughing stock of the ignorant and shallow-minded is to be treated as other diseased and abnormal persons are treated. He is to be compelled to abstain from the use of alcohol. He is to be cured by medical and social treatment. But this is not all. The sources of his disorder must be sought, as in the case of other diseases. This means that public opinion will be educated and that the sentiment against commercializing the weakness of human nature will grow until the laws of the nations shall embody the visions of philanthropists and the conclusions of science rather than ancient prejudice and heartless greed. The Meaning of Baptism

We shall take up our study at the point where it was rather abruptly broken off last week. Baptism, we saw, is a social institution or rite auxiliary to the church. Its whole meaning is derived from its function in the church. It is initiation, induction, into the social organism which, in the mystical terms of the New Testament, is called the body of Christ. As such, therefore, baptism is the church defining itself. Without such initiation, such conferment of a Christian status upon individuals by the church, the church itself would lose its identity; it would cease to be a positive, definite, self-conscious organism.

This function of baptism registers itself both in the individual mind of the initiate and in the corporate mind of the church. Without being too nice in our analysis we saw, on the one hand, that it gives the individual a consciousness of right and privilege in the religious community and, on the other hand, that it gives the church a certain authority over the individual. Baptism is thus a means of social control, organizing individual life into a corporate life in order to make the purposes of religion effective both in the individual soul and in the social order.

In speaking thus of baptism the reader is asked to keep in mind the basic distinction we have made between baptism itself and the particular physical act by which it is solemnized. The baptism whose function it is to define the corporate life of the church as an institution in the social order is not a physical act; it is a psychical, social, spiritual act. It utilizes the physical to be sure—as do all psychical and social acts—for purposes of expression, publicity, solemnization, or symbolism; but the essential thing in the baptismal act is not its overt physical sign, but its spiritual purpose.

The full absurdity of the immersionist contention that baptism and immersion are equivalents does not appear until a sociological analysis of the ceremony has been made. Even in the solemnization of the ceremony by immersion it is the non-physical factor that has significance. This social, psychical factor in the act is what distinguishes it from a mere bath. Many immersionists, to guard themselves against the charge of teaching water regeneration, are accustomed to distinguish the baptismal act from a mere bath by defining baptism as "the immersion in water of a penitent believer." They imagine that this definition somehow puts into the physical act of immersion a spiritual content. If the immersion is preceded by faith and repentance it is assumed to partake of the nature of faith and repentance. But this definition does not define.

Penitent believers are, presumably, many times immersed without being baptized! To say baptism is the immersion of a penitent believer leaves us therefore quite as hopelessly upon the physical plane as does the doctrine of water regeneration. It does not give us any principle by which to distinguish the baptism of a penitent believer from his accustomed bath. Each act is the immersion of a penitent believer. What is it that gives baptismal significance to one act of immersion performed by a penitent believer while other acts of immersion performed by the same penitent believer have no baptismal significance? This question the dogmatic immersionist does not answer, because to answer it is to confess that the distinctive and essential thing in the baptismal ceremony is not the physical act of immersion but the social act of induction or initiation into the church of Christ. It is obvious that the mere precedence of immersion by faith and penitence does not give to the physical act a baptismal character. Nor is the definition helped by adding the august names of the Trinity as directed in the great commission. Even so, the essential element in baptism is left out—the spiritual, psychical, social act of self-consecration by the individual and his initiation by the church.

* * * *

There is no natural connection—ethical, logical, psychological, or otherwise—between faith and immersion or between repentance and immersion. Faith has other and natural ways of expressing itself; repentance has other and natural ways of expresing itself. Never in a millenium would an ethical faith or an ethical repentance feel drawn toward the physical act of immersion as a peculiarly appropriate mode of self-expression, or to any other physical act. The natural expression of moral faith and moral penitence is a moral act. Service, self-denial, resistance to temptation, forbearance, tolerance, humility, love of truth, the pursuit of righteousness, communion with God, love—these are the true and only outward signs of the inward graces of faith and repentance.

The physical act of immersion is nothing in itself; it has been taken up by the fiat of social custom and made the symbol, the expression, the publication to the world, of the social act of initiation into the body of Christ. It marks and memorializes, on the human side, the meeting place of the corporate will of the church and the surrendered will of the penitent believer in a spiritual act of mutual identification.

By a procedure which we regard as irregular and unfortunate, involving a distinct loss to the church, this primitive custom of solemnizing initiation into the body of Christ by immersion in water has been changed to other forms throughout a large part of Christendom. There are good and sufficient reasons, as we shall undertake to show, why the early practice should be restored. But the usual reason put forward by immersionists, namely, that only immersion is baptism, is intolerable. Baptism is solemnized by other forms than immersion. Not all who have been initiated into the church have been immersed. The body of Christ is not composed exclusively of immersed believers. Churches that practice affusion are churches of Christ as truly as are churches that practice only immersion. And their members are truly members of the church of Christ, validly initiated into its fellowship, that is, baptized. In any urging of immersion we must not "paganize the church," as Thomas Campbell replied to his son, Alexander, when the latter first suggested that no one had been baptized who had not been immersed.

No, baptism is not immersion. Nor is it the immersion of a penitent believer. It is the initiation or induction of a penitent believer into the church of Christ.

* * * *

We say above in making a list of the outward signs of faith and repentance that these are their "true and only" outward signs. We are now prepared to revise that statement and affirm that baptism is a true outward sign of these inward graces worthy to be included in any list of the moral virtues. Not immersion, not affusion, not any physical act, but the spiritual act of uniting oneself with those who are of like mind concerning Jesus Christ—this is a true moral sign of faith and repentance. And this is baptism.

Baptism, we say, therefore, is a moral virtue. It is not a physical act; not the putting away of the filth of the flesh. It is not an outward form. It is the response of a good conscience toward God. Its moral quality is rooted in the conscience. It has back of it the same divine authority that sanctions any other moral duty.

The duty of baptism is the duty of church membership, the alliance of oneself with Christ's people, openly and actively merging one's personality into the organism of Christ's body, contributing one's self and one's goods to the furtherance of the ideals of the Christian community, bearing any odium the body must suffer, rejoicing in the joy of its victories, finding one's life by losing it in the organic life of that community of which Christ is Head and Lord.

To be a strong hand in the dark to another in the time of need, to be a cup of strength to a human soul in a crisis of weakness, is to know the glory of life.—Hugh Black.

The Unity Demanded by Democracy

It is clear to all thinking statesmen that if our republic is to survive, there must be some unity of sentiment to hold it together. We have been busy in our social circles discussing the things that divide, such as wealth, race, employment and the rest. It is for a foremost sociologist to point out recently that the most divisive of all things in our republics is the chasm between the good and the bad, the regenerate and the profligate. In Chicago the contest over the open Sunday exemplifies this. The saloon question exemplifies it. The vice question is in point. No one thing so threatens our national unity as division over moral and religious ideals. The Continent states the function of the church in view of this in a profoundly convincing way:

But on the other hand, in the light of this analysis, the church may see a supreme opportunity to perform, in saving individual men, an indispensable saving service for its nation.

The church, preaching its gospel rightly and exemplifying it fully, can make religion a mighty factor of like-mindedness among American citizens.

This does not propose any mealy-mouthed utterance of Christ's demands for clean, square life in the individual soul; it does not point to any paltering compromise with sin; it does not signify a weakening down of God's judgments on unrighteousness.

But it does mean the constant setting forth and showing forth of the loving compassions of Jesus Christ, who never withdraws the hand of brotherly solicitude from any man because he is vile nor abandons him to his wickedness because he is stubborn or stolid.

Christianity in its ecclesiastical, ritualistic, intellectual or cultural aspects—its aspects of pride—is often divisive; but with its mission for saving men held foremost, it is a force knitting men together and inducing like-mindedness in them.

It may indeed fail to win all men to its standard, but in the mood of seeking all men, it will command the reverence of all. Though many may awhile hate it for the vigor of its assaults on their evil doings, normal humanity will in the end yield honor to its ideals and acknowledge its moral suzerainty in the national life.

A church thoroughly desiring Christ's honor and men's redemption can prevent the cleavage of America on any fundamental question of morals, and if America is not split apart by immoral tendencies, it will hold together in the face of all other differences.

Is not the duty thus rising into view fairly to be called "The Greater Patriotism?" Will the church be faithful in it?

Pastors May Profit by Defeats

Some will say, though, that the typical modern church will never take a man for its pastor if it has the slightest suspicion that he has ever been anything but a vast success wherever he has preached. The feeling (if not the word) of many preachers is that they could not possibly get another charge anywhere if they admitted that any former congregation had sound reason to ask a resignation.

In some degree this approaches truth; churches are mightily sensitive to any blot of ill success on a minister's record.

But the reason underlying that is the general opinion or laymen that preachers never learn anything by their mistakes; that if a man has made a bad blunder in any place he is pretty sure in the next place to go and do the same foolish thing over again.

Unfortunately there is only too much support in the history of ministers for the feeling that if a man fails in one field because he is lazy, unresponsive, cold, self-opinionated, arrogant, extravagant, frivolous, weak initiative and execution he will be all the same things in his next field.

But that opinion will not be dissipated by concealment of defeats.

When some man is big enough and strong enough to turn round on the ordinary custom and say to the pastoral committee of a church considering his name, "You will find I failed in my last charge for certain definite reasons of which I am wholly aware, and I shall not fail for the same reasons again," the prejudice which is now supposed to hinder candor will vanish.

Laymen know how that is themselves. They blunder in business, but they don't lose in the same place the second time for the same mistake. The preacher who likewise profits by the lessons of his failures will grapple their confidence to him with hooks of steel.

Armour & Company on November 1 started a pension fund for their 15,000 employees. A fund of $1,000,000 has been contributed by the firm and an assessment is made on the employees. When an employee retires he or she will receive two per cent of the salary received at the time of retirement for each year of service.

Startling Conditions in China

Not a community in America but there is in it some particular friend of Christian missionary work in China. Few communities there are that have not furnished one or more of the almost 5,000 missionaries now in that country. The missionary societies report that nothing in the present uprising in China seems aimed at foreigners, while there are many reasons why rebels and loyalists alike will protect them, if for none other than to prevent intervention by American or European powers and possible division of their empire.

The Committee of Reference and Counsel of all foreign missionary societies of the United States and Canada, Rev. Dr. Arthur J. Brown of the Presbyterian Board chairman, has just sent to churches in both countries requests for intercessory prayer by Christian people, giving as reasons many startling facts. These facts are under three heads:

1. For the people of China, a great and virile nation which, awakened from the torpor of ages by the quickening forces of the modern world, is convulsed by civil war at a time when all its energies are needed for the legislative, economic, educational and moral readjustments which the new era involves. Flood, famine and pestilence are intensifying the tragedy of internal strife. Vast areas have been inundated in the provinces of Gan-hwei, Kiang-su and Hu-nan, the two former facing desolation and famine for the third time in five years. The Yang-tse River is forty-five miles wide 250 miles from the sea, and thousands of villages have been submerged. Five hundred thousand families must be aided through the winter at an average cost of $15 per family, or ten times more people will die of starvation than of wounds in battle.

2. For the Chinese Christians, who share in full measure the privations and sorrows that are the common lot of their countrymen, and often the despairing reproaches of their non-Christian neighbors who imagine that these multiplied calamitites are due to the wrath of the spirits against those who have abandoned the ancestral faith. Hundreds of Chinese pastors, teachers and evangelists, who have been supported wholly or in part by the Christians on the field, cannot now be maintained by their impoverished people. Churches and schools have been swept away by floods, families have been scattered by war, and multitudes of Christians are without food and shelter for the winter.

3. For the missionaries, who are in positions of extraordinary difficulty. With myriads of ruined and starving Chinese looking to them for provisions and employment, with throngs of the sick and injured daily brought for treatment, with Chinese and foreigners alike expecting them to perform the herculean task of purchasing and distributing food, they must incessantly toil in circumstances of almost unbearable physical and mental strain.

In addition to the special burdens which revolution and famine entail, there are increased responsibilities for the great and varied missionary work under their care, a work which is now represented by 4,299 foreign missionaries, 11,611 Chinese ministers, teachers and evangelists, 3,485 stations and out-stations, 2,029 primary schools, 1,116 academies, colleges, industrial, medical, nurses' and normal schools, 170 hospitals, 14 orphanages, 16 leper asylums, 3 homes for untainted children of lepers, 11 institutions for the blind and for deaf mutes, 5 rescue homes for fallen women, 100 opium refuges, 2 industrial homes, 1 asylum for the insane, 2,341 churches with 278,628 members, a Christian community of 750,000, and property valued at millions of dollars—all this not including the missions of the Roman Catholic Church.

"Christian work," says the Committee, "has been greatly prospered, the growth in a decade having been 175 per cent. The missionaries are in immediate charge of this extensive enterprise. The American Minister at Peking has ordered women and children out of the zones of hostilities, but as a rule the men heroically remain at their posts. They feel that they can no more leave at such a time than a physician could leave his patients when contagious disease is epidemic, or a chaplain his regiment in time of war. This is the day when the faithful missionary of Christ is most needed, not only to care for the mission property and work, but to comfort and serve the excited and distressed people and to aid in caring for the sick and wounded."

Speaking for the American and Canadian missionary societies themselves, the committee refuses to emphasize their needs, but reminds Christian people of both countries that societies must stand by their workers, and that famine and other special funds ought not to act to decrease regular gifts, for regular expenditures are being increased as a necessary part of the present situation.

Men and Religion to Date

Sixteen Men and Religion campaign conventions have now been held in as many cities that were regularly planned by the general committee, and seventy-four conventions have been held under the extension plan of having deputations from tributary towns attend main conventions and return home to duplicate the meetings. In the cities of medium size it is found in practice that practically all Protestant churches take part. In the cities of largest size 75 per cent of the churches do so. Others have not expressed dissent, but have simply not united.

The average registration of men in the sixteen cities has been 600. These do not include men who merely attend banquets, but only those who take the full week's instructions, and express intention to maintain personal work. Many of them are representatives of smaller cities, and are therefore leaders. At one central convention, that of Cedar Rapids, one hundred and ten other Iowa towns were represented under the extension plan.

The most tangible result of the campaign thus far is a largely increased attendance upon Bible classes. In some churches where no classes for men existed they have been formed. Representatives of the general committee are following up the work in every city where conventions have been held, not to garner results, but to check up the local men and to see that they gather in harvests. These general representatives are also studying effects, and reporting for the advantage of conventions yet to be held. Together general and local men are now co-operating on the task of bringing men into the churches and training them for service.

The Farmer and the Churches

Taking up work begun by President Roosevelt's Country Life Commission, which urged the holding of local, state and even national conferences on rural progress, the Churches are making surveys and holding local conferences throughout the country, at well established centers of agricultural industry. Rev. Dr. Warren H. Wilson, head of the Presbyterian Department of Church and Country Life and his assistant, Miss Anna B. Taft, have just returned from a conference held at Memphis, Nov. 13 and 14. Speaking of the condition of the farmers, Dr. Wilson says he found a great awakening of spirit among the cotton growers, and the people commonly called the "poor whites."

"This is mainly due," he said, "to the splendid work started by the Department of Agriculture, which is doing a great demonstration work in eleven southern states. The farmers have awakened from their apathy, and are finding themselves in a marvelous manner. The increase that they have made in their corn and cotton crops through scientific farming, has made them hungry for knowledge of all kinds, and it is an opportunity that the church must not neglect. I find the southern farmer keenly alive to all suggestions that can be made for his good," continued Dr. Wilson, "much more so than that the self-satisfied farmer of the Middle West, who is inclined to be complacent over his success, or the old-time farmers of New England, who are hide bound by traditions and are inclined to resent any change in the methods of church work in their community.

The conference in Memphis was attended by ministers and professional men generally. There were present a large number of lawyers, doctors, bankers, educators and capitalists, besides the men actively engaged in the work. "We are teaching the country preacher how not only to preach on Sundays, but to care for his people on week-days. Every church has a population which it must serve and it must develop along social and economic lines if it would live in the new South which is no longer disheartened, but one of the livest sections of the whole country. We do not plan to make the church a great social center as in the cities, but rather to make it the leader of activities in its own local community. Preachers must show their people how to play as well as pray, for recreation must be brought to both the farmer and his wife, who frequently toil from four in the morning until nine at night, with no hope in the future of any rest from the grinding routine which is the bane of country life."

"The farmer's wife," said Miss Taft, who has studied the question carefully, "is the most discontented person in the community. But as women are generally more sensible than men, these farmers' wives must have good reasons for their discontent. And there are many reasons. The kitchen, where women spend most of their time, is generally the most inconvenient workshop in the land. Running water is a luxury had only by the few and other conveniences are as limited. Mothers know that their children are receiving but crude education in the schools of the community, many teachers being totally unfitted for the work. The church must change these conditions. It must lighten the burden of the farmer's wife, and it is beginning to do so."

The Visitor

The Disciples in New York City

The Disciples of Christ in New York City have reached a moment of great interest in the development of their work. After a long period of slow growth in which the ideals of expansion and mission work prevailing in the West were urged and utilized as fully as possible, the leaders in that metropolis seem to have reached the wise conclusion that the best interests of our propaganda there demand not expansion but centralization, and the development of a congregation important and strong enough to bear adequate testimony to the work of the great body of Disciples in America.

It is easy to believe that the obligation of the brotherhood is the same in all sections of the country, and that missions should be planted and churches established wherever there is need, and the interests of our common Christianity do not suffer by denominational intrusion on our part. This is certainly true in those parts of the country which are still formative and where the Disciples are sufficiently numerous and strong to make the program effective.

* * * *

But in the East the situation is very different. Our people came into being too late in the history of the country, and at a point too far west, to materially influence the conservative life of the East by the regular ministeries of evangelism and church building. We have obtained local influence in a few centers, largely through the devotion of men who have remained loyally in the same church for many years and have acted as personal and trusted interpreters of our message. But for the most part our churches in the East have been barely able to maintain themselves by the accessions which came from the provinces and from the West. And in some instances this bare survival has been the only result, notwithstanding considerable amounts of missionary money devoted to their aid.

The reason for this condition does not lie in inefficiency or unfaithfulness, though there have been instances of both in the history of these churches. It lies rather in the fundamental facts that the Disciples are not an eastern people in their habits of thought or methods of work, and that they have never felt themselves at home on the Atlantic seaboard.

* * * *

It is inevitable, therefore, that they must choose between two alternatives. They must on the one hand, continue to believe that their message is equally for the East and the West, and must disregard the seemingly conclusive facts which would point to the impracticable nature of missionary effort on their part in the East at the present time. In this case they will continue to plant missions and to put missionary funds into enterprises of a more or less precarious character, with the probable result of seeing them decline and die later on.

On the other hand they may frankly face the situation as it exists. They may recognize the fact that they are very much nearer the position both of Baptists and Congregationalists in the East than in the West, and that the average religiously inclined person in the East prefers to continue in the religious relationship to which he has been accustomed rather than to attach himself to a comparatively unknown group of people, particularly when that group appears to differ only slightly from other religious organizations with which he is acquainted. In this case the leaders of our work in the East will recognize their duty less to build up numerous congregations than to strengthen a few representative churches in centers like Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington. These strong churches we greatly need, both to receive care for the large numbers of Disciples who go East to reside, and also for the purpose of bearing testimony to the people of these cities regarding the history and ideals of the Disciples throughout the country.

* * * *

We have had a number of vigorous churches in larger New York, and these churches ought to be maintained and strengthened. But it is clear to the writer that on Manhattan Island we are in great need of one church much stronger than any single congregation we now possess. It is this need of uniting our forces in the metropolis which presents the emergency and opportunity now upon us.

For some time there has been a steady growth of sentiment toward the union of the mother church at 81st Street and the vigorous Lenox Avenue congregation at 119th Street. A few months ago the older church moved from 56th Street to 81st, thereby greatly improving its opportunity for efficiency. But even so its membership and equipment have not been adequate to its field. It has been but partially able to care for the Disciples who come in such numbers to the city from the West. And its location, though comfortable and accessible, is not conspicuous.

It is now felt that if these two congregations could unite they would furnish the basis of such a work as could begin to impress itself upon numbers of our own people now without church homes in the city, and also upon the Christian community of New York in general. Steps have recently been taken to consummate this union. The official boards of the two churches reached perfect agreement upon the subject. Pastors Craig and Fisher both resigned to leave the united congregation in perfect freedom to choose its leaders. The project of selling both properties and securing a much more adequate plant somewhere on Broadway was taken up with confidence and enthusiasm. In fact it was widely announced in our papers that the union had actually been accomplished.

But there were some of the Lenox Avenue people who felt reluctant to abandon the community in which they wished to do a local and somewhat social work. For this reason when the question was submitted to that congregation it was disapproved by a small majority. With great tact and wisdom the officers of the two churches, who are still a unit upon the union proposition, have determined to take no radical steps but to foster the sentiment in the hope that the united church may be realized in a short time. It is believed that this will be the result, and it would be much better to achieve it in this quiet and constructive way than by any radical measures, however successful they might prove.

* * * *

The Visitor spent an exceedingly enjoyable day with the congregation at 81st Street. Many of the Lenox Avenue people were present at the services. The memories of a year ago, when the centennial anniversary of the old church was celebrated, were fresh in mind. More than ever it seemed clear that manifest destiny marks out the path of union and concentrated growth. A great opportunity is before the Disciples of New York if they can rise from local to city-wide horizons. A great company of Disciples is added each year to the population of New York. Probably a much larger proportion of these people could be gathered into a church of the character contemplated than the present congregations can reach.

But particularly could the Disciples under the circumstances contemplated have a platform of such conspicuity and speak a message of such force as to be heard in the great city. Some of their ministers in the past, notably Dr. B. B. Tyler, have exerted a real influence upon the ministerial circles of the metropolis. But the handicap of a small and obscure church equipment renders ineffective even the most forceful interpreter. The combination of both ought to give the Disciples a new and impressive place in the life of our first city. And the Visitor anticipates such an outcome from the wisdom and courage with which the leaders of our cause in New York are now studying the problem. Mr. Fisher, whose work has been admirable and effective, continues to minister to the church at 81st Street, though ready at any time to aid in the larger share in any manner possible.

When the keen scrutiny of skeptics has found a place on this planet ten miles square where a decent man can live in decency, comfort, and security, supporting and educating his children unspoiled and unpolluted—a place where age is reverenced, infancy respected, womanhood honored, and human life held in due regard—when skeptics can find such a place, ten miles square, on this globe, where the gospel of Christ has not gone and cleared the way and laid the foundations and made decency and security possible, it will then be in order for the skeptical literati to move thither and ventilate their views.—James Russell Lowell.

We cannot remove the conditions under which our work is to be done, but we can transform them. They are the elements out of which we must build the temples wherein we serve.—Brooke Foss Westcott.

The Church Speaks to America's Toilers

Words of the Church's Fraternal Delegate to the Federation of Labor

BY CHARLES S. MACFARLAND

EDITORS' NOTE.—The beginnings of real accomplishment in the matter of bringing the resources of the church into earnest practical action on behalf of working men are at last apparent. The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America sent Secretary Macfarland as a fraternal delegate to the recent convention of the American Federation of Labor at Atlanta, Ga., and after his address the convention framed a resolution of appreciation of the new spirit manifested by the churches. Dr. Macfarland engaged the convention's coöperation in a nation-wide campaign to secure to all industrial workers one day's rest in seven. This campaign is soon to be launched by the Federal Council's Commission on the Church and Social Service. We regard the informal address which Dr. Macfarland delivered at Atlanta as of highest significance. The spirit of it is the spirit of primitive and essential Christianity. And it is the spirit of historic Christianity, too, except that the church has not always possessed adequate machinery and, perhaps, clear enough vision to express itself fully. More and more the bond of sympathy and common interest between the church and the great mass of toilers is being strengthened. Only when the church, transcending all class distinctions, completely identifies her life with them will the full measure of her ministry be accomplished.

I cannot come before you, strictly speaking as a union member, because my craft, although it knows as yet no minimum wage, and has a pretty low average, is as yet unorganized. And when, in my boyhood and young manhood, I was engaged in manual toil, there was no union in my trade, or if there was, I did not know it.

While I was in Newcastle last summer, attending the British Trades Union Congress, in writing to my home I asked the question: "Why is it that I have given up my vacation to come up here for this meeting? It is more than anything else, I think, because, as I look into the faces of these men, I see a vision in the background of millions of homes, mothers and children, some with the glow of happiness, with countenances expressing the joy of health, like my own home, and still more of other little children with the haggard face of want, and with womanhood bent and burdened by the relentless iron hand of industrial rapacity or maladjustment."

The Church's Attitude.

Let me at the beginning of my relations with you, say a word as to the attitude of the Christian Church. It should not be that of entangling itself with your economic machinery but rather, first, that of continually reminding you of the moral idealism of your movement, and second, of co-operating with you in what should be, and are, your ultimate moral aims and ends.

I am in the warmest sympathy with Mr. Duncan as to a certain movement in Germany, and my estimate, made during a recent visit there, is much the same as his. I would, as quickly as any one of you, resent the assumption and intrusion of any ecclesiastical or clerical authority.

But your leaders and ours are rapidly discovering that we are moving in parallel lines and in the performance of sympathetic tasks.

Social Program of Churches.

Perhaps the best evidence of progress, during the past year, was the request which came to me from this national Federation of Churches, to resign my pastorate, in order that I might give myself entirely to the social service work of the churches of the nation. Upon my assumption of office, a clear-cut program was handed me and, under the providence of God, it becomes my duty to carry out that program.

Among other things, it speaks as follows:

"To us it seems that the churches must stand—
"For equal rights and complete justice for all men in all stations of life."

Among the other things that are passing away is that old heresy that there is any inherent difference between the work of the head and the work of the hand; that the one element of humanity belongs down here and the other up there. Whenever in the university city of New Haven, I happen to be passing in company with one of its learned professors, it always gives me a sense of mischievous joy to see the bootblack who calls himself 'professor,' because it is an intimation that honest service rendered in one sphere of life is equally entitled to recognition with any other.

"For the right of all men to the opportunity for self-maintenance, a right ever to be wisely and strongly safeguarded against encroachments of every kind. For the rights of workers to some protection against the hardships often resulting from the swift crises of industrial change."
"For the principle of conciliation and arbitration in industrial dissensions."
"For the protection of the worker from dangerous machinery, occupational disease, injuries and mortality."

This leaves no room for "Fellow servant," "assumption of risk," or any other specious limitation.

The Burden of Disaster.

It means nothing else or less than that the burden of disaster should be borne, not by the toiler who gives himself or his life as a sacrifice upon the altar of industry, but by the industry which he serves, in some fair and equitable way. I spent two days last summer in Berlin, with the chairman of the German Commission, and it seems to me that they are working in the right direction.

The other articles read:

"For the abolition of child labor."
"For such regulation of the conditions of toil for women as shall safeguard the physical and moral health of the community."
"For the suppression of the 'sweating system.'"
"For the gradual and reasonable reduction of the hours of labor to the lowest practicable point, and for that degree of leisure for all which is a condition of the highest human life."
"For a release from employment one day in seven."
"For a living wage as a minimum in every industry, and for the highest wage that each industry can afford."
"For suitable provision for the old age of the workers and for those incapacitated by injury."
"For the abatement of poverty."

But, gentlemen, that creed of confession is not worth the paper upon which it is printed, unless it also takes into account some means by which it can effectively be carried out. Therefore, the wise and thoughtful men who framed it, added this final clause:

"To the toilers of America and to those who by organized effort are seeking to lift the crushing burdens of the poor, and to reduce the hardships and uphold the dignity of labor, this Council sends the greetings of human brotherhood and the pledge of sympathy and of help in a cause which belongs to all who follow Christ."

And that I understand, is the reason why I am sent here by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ.

Carrying Out the Program.

We have, therefore, within the past few days, endeavored to put that program into actual operation.

First, by the establishing of a national office, in which, you will be interested to know, we receive over two hundred Labor papers and magazines regularly, and while I do not read them all through, I think perhaps I may say that I read more Labor literature than some of you brethren do of religious reading.

Here is another item:

"The relation of the churches to the multitude of Agencies of Social Reform and betterment is an important problem before the Commission. Its influence will be brought to co-operate with such societies and movements in relation especially to those measures which affect the moral and spiritual welfare of the people. This will include such matters as child labor, the reduction of hours, the betterment of wages, housing conditions, and many other similar causes."

That means close working relations, not only with your movement, but with others, like the Child Labor Committee, the Consumer's League, the Association for Labor Legislation, and the Woman's Trade Union League.

Educational Work of Council.

The Federal Council is also becoming the publishing agency to issue handbooks and study courses for our preachers and churches, an important feature of which will be to give them a sympathetic understanding of the interests of Labor. We shall, by means of news letters, like your own, inform the labor and trade journals of our doings and the religious press of your movements.

Here is another significant item:

"To the toilers of America and to those who by sentatives and will send its delegates to their gatherings. Similarly, it will confer with groups of business men and send delegates to their gatherings."

If any of you should be conservative enough to object to one part of this, I shall have to answer as I once did on a similar occasion. Having accepted an invitation to offer the opening prayer at a Republican convention, then a little later on, also at a Democratic convention, and being rebuked for my inconsistency by a Republican candidate, I asked him if he did not think that the one element needed praying for fully as much as the other.

This program announces that an impartial investigation will be made of important industries and I want to say that we shall make them fair and open, and rebuke wrong and oppression, even if we should find you to be the oppressors.

One Day in Seven.

There is one matter in relation to which it seems to me you have lost much ground. We are having, gentlemen, a very rapid increase in what are conveniently called "Continuous Industries," and most of them involve continuous toil for the workers. I wish to say fairly and squarely, in the name of the Federal Council of Churches, that for a man to be deprived of one day out of seven for rest and recreation; for cultivation of the life of his home; for companionship with his wife and children; and for his moral and spiritual culture, is an unspeakable disgrace upon our nation, and when it comes to be not even one day in thirty, or as in some cases, not even one day in 365, there is no appropriate vocabulary with which to give it description.

We talk a good deal about the "dignity of labor," as a paltry and beggarly excuse for forgetting and neglecting the dignity of him who labors.

Therefore, we have entered upon a nation-wide campaign for one day in seven for industrial workers, and in this I am sure that my colleague, Father Dietz, will express a hearty co-operation; for whatever may be the differentiation between us, there is certainly no such thing as Catholic seven-day labor as distinguished from Protestant overwork.

Observance of Labor Sunday.

For the purpose of renewing interest in all these plans, we mean to preserve and increase the observance of Labor Sunday in the pulpits and by the churches of the land.

When I ask myself what service we can best render in this great cause, I begin to look for those aspects of it which seem to be neglected. Among these is the creation of a better state of public opinion. I think this has been neglected. The great mass of the people who are not directly affected by the wrongs of Labor are either indifferent or hostile. I am frank to say, whatever may be the explanation, that you do not receive on the whole, a fair treatment from the press.

In this situation there are many things which need to be explained to those who are not on the inside of your reasons, and I mean to do my best to bring about a fair and just attitude regarding your movement.

Reads Letters Sent to His Wife.

I am richly enjoying these days with you. Perhaps it will do no harm to put a little touch of human nature into the formality of this address. I write each evening, a letter to my wife regarding the doings of the day. It is a very good thing to do, gentlemen, and I hope you do it. Here are some extracts from these daily letters:

"This is an historic meeting, charged with most serious and solemn tasks. I like its carefully ordered ways and measures."

"Old Samuel Gompers (the descriptive adjective, Mr. President, is in the nature of a term of affection and relates to your length of service rather than to the number of your days) gave his address today. Had he been the leading actor in the Old Testament story of the Prophet Daniel, that story would have been the same. His companions in the apartment would have taken him for one after their own heart. But I more than suspect that the old man's heart is as big as his head, and his address today was a classic in economics, an epitome of history and a moral phillipic that would do credit to an inspired ancient or modern prophet. To read that address is to take a course in political economy."

Labor Leader's Clerical Look.

"If James Duncan were to wear a black frock coat and a white tie to set forth his measured dignity in fitting garb, I never would be taken as the representative of the churches at this convention. His review today of his recent trip abroad, was a masterpiece of serious statesmanship, wide information, broad vision and keen discernment."

"John Mitchell has grown still shyer during a year when he has grown to be a bigger man than ever in the estimation of his fellows and the world at large, because he has gone through the crucible of a severe test of loyalty."

"If I were to go back to the local pastorate again, I would like to be called to the Presbyterian Church at Bloomington, Ilinois, that I might have John Lennon as my senior deacon, to keep me in the straight and narrow way."

Order Out of Chaos.

"Why is it that all our moral leaders do not see that in the American Federation of Labor, with its tried and proven economic machinery, the most gigantic economic force of any day or generation, we have, in the midst of our seething, threatening, social unrest, one great safety valve, one great conserving, constructive social agency, one clear speaking voice amid the many clamoring tongues, so many of which "Are like infants crying in the night,

Like infants crying for the light,
And with no language but a cry," one great evolutionary force that is, more than anything else, bringing order out of chaos, because it mingles light with heat and serves not only to incite but also to restrain. My profound belief is that, far more than they know, these men hold the destinies of human social order."

You can readily see, gentlemen, that my utterances need be somewhat cautious and guarded, because, at least in an ideal sense, I commit by them a constituency of 100,000 churches and 18,000,000 men and women, and the utterances which I am now to make are not without premeditation. There is surely one thing for which the church cannot stand. It cannot stand for anarchy. And one definition of anarchy is that it is the attempted destruction of any fundamental institution of society. In a democratic state, the organization of labor is, by the common agreement of statesmen and economists, one of those fundamental institutions.

Movement Calls for Restraint.

It needs guidance; it calls for restraint; its methods should be the subject of most careful thought and revision, but with all its limitations, this remains true, that any group of men who conspire together for the covert or avowed intent and purpose of crushing out of existence the organization of industry, would be the most dangerous and dreaded group of anarchists in this or any other land.

Brethren of this convention, in our ultimate aims, we belong together. In the mind and heart of God, such movements as your own and his church look toward the coming of the same Kingdom of Heaven. And what God hath joined together, let no man put asunder. And I say it thoughtfully and reverently, of any man who would seek to separate the church and modern industry, it were better for him, as our Master said, "that a mill stone be hanged about his neck and he be cast into the depths of the sea.."

For, after all, the church and the gospel have been, in large measure, creators of social unrest, because the gospel has given to man the vision of a high, pure and noble life.

Church Has Faltered.

There is one of the old masterpieces upon which I love to gaze. It is the painting of Raphael in the Vatican at Rome, of the transfiguration of our common Master. But whenever I look upon it, I wish that I might have the genius to wield the brush of a master, that I might paint and place beside it one other picture which would be that of the same Master a little later in the day, down upon the plane of human life, healing men of their diseases and feeding their hunger.

It must be admitted that the church has faltered some in the face of the great social problems which she, herself, has partly created. She is now with Peter, on his way from Rome, in the old story of the Russian novelist.

"Seest thou yon brightness approaching us."

"I see nothing," said Nazarius.

"Some figure is coming in the gleam of the sun."

Then Peter fell upon his knees and this cry left his lips:

"O Christ! O, Christ!"

Then the question: "Quo Vadis, Domine?"

"If thou desert my people, I go back to Rome to be crucified a second time."

Quo Vadis, Domine." This time the question of Nazarius to Peter.

"To Rome," said the apostle, and he returned.

The Ideal of the Movement.

I bid you, then, go on with your work patiently, guardedly, with a deepening sense of justice, until every home in our land, even to the home of the last poor stranger that comes within our gates, becomes the abode of happiness and health:

Until the rushing wheels and roar of industry no longer drown the moans, while they blight the lives of little children as dear to God as your children and mine:

Until womanhood in the home shall be a a happy wifehood and a sweet motherhood that shall bear its own natural and sufficient burdens without the sad countenance of hunger of body and of soul, or if in toil, shall have the safeguards of virtue and health:

Until manhood, with a toil that does not diminish self-respect and with leisure to cultivate the finer graces of our human life, shall be in the answer to our prayer: "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, as in Heaven, so on earth;"

Until the Fatherhood of God shall be in reality and truth a Brotherhood of Man.

And to this end I repeat:

"To the toilers of America and to those who by organized effort are seeking to lift the crushing burdens of the poor, and to reduce the hardships and uphold the dignity of labor, this council sends the greetings of human brotherhood and the pledge of sympathy and of help in a cause which belongs to all who follow Christ."

A Chapter From the Book of Hannah

Rebecca Wentworth Spalding.

Ye have heard of Hannah and how the word of the Lord came to Samuel, her son. Now I will tell you of another Hannah, who also loved the Lord and served him all her days, and of how the word of the Lord came to the daughter of Hannah's daughter.

When Hannah was old she abode with her daughter, for she was a widow. And the youngest child of Hannah's daughter was called Hannah, and she was of tender years. And Hannah loved the child and cherished her. And a day came when she said to the child, "Come, let us go a Sabbath day's journey into the country."

And they two set forth to go to the house of Hannah's son, and the house of her son was in the midst of a garden, and many children ran in and out of it, and a brook ran through the garden, and at the end of the garden there was a well of clear water and a high fence was around about the place, and a great gate swung back when any entered there. It was a place of delight to the child Hannah and they two journeyed toward it with glad hearts.

And they passed the homes of those whom the Lord had prospered, and they greeted their friends whom they knew, and they went on and came to the outskirts of the town where were the dwelling places of the

The Prodigal Son's Brother

A Square Look at an Overlooked Character

BY EDGAR DEWITT JONES.

The parable of the Prodigal Son is at once a familiar and popular pulpit theme. Ministers of all shades of theological thought like to preach from Luke the fifteenth chapter and this parable is a prime favorite with evangelists everywhere. Nor is this to be wondered at. The story of the prodigal is full of human interest. It is a life-drama in five acts: The Old Home, The Far Country, The Swine Field, The Homeward Journey, The Father's Welcome.

Here as in no other scripture we are made to feel that "There's a wideness in God's mercy,

Like the wideness of the sea,
There's a kindness in his justice,
Which is more than liberty."

Familiar as this parable is, we seldom attach much importance to its latter portion, most of us are accustomed to stop short with the twenty-fourth verse. The prodigal gets all the lime-light; his brother is left among the shadows. I propose that we get a good "square look" at the elder brother and that we study his character silhouetted as it is so darkly against a wondrously fair background.

The Prodigal's Brother Introduced.

Coming from the fields, the elder brother is astonished to find the whole house given over to gaiety and festivity. There is much bustle and confusion, there is going to and fro and the soft sound of music comes from within. The elder brother stops outside puzzled and perplexed. Why should there be a feast without his knowledge and approval? What does it all mean! He calls a servant and asks for an explanation. The answer instead of reassuring him perplexes and pains him still more. "Thy brother is come and thy father hath killed the fatted calf because he hath received him safe and sound." At this piece of news, the elder brother's surprised perplexity gives way to sullen anger, "So this is it" he muses, "a feast for him who has been living in sin and prodigality—a feast for such a fellow—Well, I will not go in. Let them get along without me." So angry, pouting, jealous, envious, small-souled, the prodigal's brother is shown to us a most unlovely and unlovable man.

A Respectable Sinner.

The prodigal son's brother is a pronounced type of the "respectable sinner." He had not lived as his brother. He had stayed at home and worked faithfully. He had kept himself decent. He was honorable and moral clear through. For all this, let us give him credit. He seems to have been a dutiful son. Nor is there any place for excuse on the part of the prodigal for his sins. He had done wrong. He had sinned deeply. He had been foolish and short sighted. He had sown a luxuriant crop of "wild oats" and, according to an inexorable law, he harvested pain, suffering and remorse. Yet notwithstanding all this the prodigal is a more lovable character than his boastful, self-righteous, unforgiving brother who while not disreputable was a sinner of a repellant sort.

Respectable and Disrespectable Sins.

Somehow, we have divided sins into two great classes, those that seem to us respectable and the sort that we judge as disreputable and particularly heinous. Drunkenness, licentiousness, gambling, stealing, profanity —these we put in a class quite by themselves. These we inveigh against vehemently, continually. And so we should, but we must not forget that selfishness, covetousness, malice, jealousy, gossip and false pride are also blameworthy in the sight of the great Judge of all the earth. This elder brother in his cold-heartedness, his stern, unrelenting spirit, is a type of religionist that called forth from Christ caustic condemnation. I think it was Beecher who in commenting on the conduct of the elder brother in this parable said: "To be perfectly moral, to be scrupulous in the every decency of society and to lose all sympathy for men, and all care for the weak and poor and imperfect, in taking care of yourself, this is more horrible to God than if you were a drunkard."

And this is a type of religionist that has done untold harm to the cause of Christ. A man who has no love in his heart, no forgiveness for an erring brother but is proud, distant and cold, carrying with him a sort of "holier than thou" atmosphere is the most unlike Christ of all men, no matter how punctilious he be in preserving the form and ceremonies—all the externals of religion. The Hoosier poet is right:

"No man is great till he can see
How less than little he can be,
If, stripped to self, and stark and bare,
He hung his sign out anywhere."

The Green-Eyed Monster.

Outside of the house, sullenly angry the elder son stands. He will not go in. So his father comes out and entreats him. But the young man is obdurate. His heart is not in the spirit of joy. Instead he is envious and jealous, and he says: "Lo these many years do I serve thee, and I never transgressed a commandment of thine, and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends, but when this thy son came, who hath divided his living with harlots thou killest for him the fatted calf." Could any other speech have been so untimely, so unlovely as this one? It is like a harsh discord in the midst of an entrancing harmony. It is like a dash and flurry of snow and sleet on a May morning. It is like gall to the taste while honey is still on the tongue. Incongruous and unhappy and out of place is this speech and conduct of the elder brother.

No wonder so many consider the parable ended when the prodigal is received back so tenderly by the Father. This entrance of the other son on the scene is like freezing frost in June when the cherries are ripe and the roses are blooming. The young man was jealous. This is easy to see. That

"Green-eyed monster which doth mock was taking complete possession of his being and when jealousy comes in happiness goes out. Where envy abides, love starves to death. Jealousy! One thinks of Cain, of King Saul, of Haaman, of Othello, of Cassius and the long list of names that are coupled with jealousy's madness. Says Solomon: "Wrath is cruel, and anger is overwhelming, but who is able to stand before jealousy?" There stands the elder son angry and sullen. What an ugly picture! No, he will not go in and even the tender intercession of his father cannot melt his heart. He speaks of the commandments that he has never broken, unmindful that he is now breaking the greatest of all commandments—that of love. Character conceit is the worst kind of conceit. I once heard that gifted London preacher, G. Campbell Morgan, say that whenever a young man arose in prayer-meeting and talked boastfully of his spiritual attainments, he always made such a one a subject of special prayer. "When a man thinketh he standeth let him take heed lest he fall," is a good text for all of us to take to heart.

The prodigal's brother reveals to his father that he has been serving him all these years as a matter of duty and not out of filial love. He reveals the heart of a servant not that of a son. He shows clearly that he is not one with his father in love and sympathy though outwardly he has seemed to be the soul of honor. So it may happen that after a life-time of respectable living something may reveal the ugly truth that all the time we have lived an alien to God's love, wearing the "livery of heaven" yet not possessing heaven in the heart.

Who is the Prodigal's Brother?

The old-time preachers used to spend a good deal of time speculating on this question. Who does this elder brother represent? Some thought the Pharisees, some the angels in their relation to the human race and still others had different theories. But I am best satisfied with the answer of an old saint who when the question was up for discussion in a minister's meeting said: "I know the fellow very well, I met him only yesterday."

"Who is he," they asked eagerly, and the old man replied solemnly, "Myself." Then he went on to explain that a few days before a man who had lived a rather worldly life had received a gracious visitation of God's goodness, and consequently, he had been envious and irritable. All of us are thus tested at times. The prodigal's brother is a picture of many of us in our attitude to people who seem to be blest of God far out of proportion to their service for him. Unable to account for it, we grow sarcastic, or suspicious and frequently pronounce judgment that is both unkind and unjust.

A Plea for Tenderness.

The prodigal's brother was absolutely devoid of tenderness. The springs of his affections had gone dry. If the prodigal had met him before he met his father it is not likely he would have gotten into the house at all. The elder son would have had no welcome for the prodigal. "Don't come back here," he would have coldly cried, "you have had your chance. You have consumed your share. There is no place for you here." What hard-heartedness, and how it suffers when contrasted with the great loving heart of the father so full of forgiveness!

Last spring, you planted a vine beside the porch or trellis. Carefully you tended that little plant, watering it and teaching the tendrils to twine about the wood work. Warmed by the sun and nourished by the rain, the vine grew and gradually climbed half way up the trellis. The leaves began to put forth and in a little while would have afforded some shade as well as a thing of beauty to grace the place and please the eye. But one night there came a storm.

The winds blew furiously and the rain fell in torrents and when you looked out of doors the next day you saw that vine lying flat on the ground and in places half submerged by the muddy water. And then what did you do? Why this! You stooped over and very tenderly lifted up the fallen vine, you twined it carefully about the trellis again and in places you fastened the tendrils by means of pieces of strings. Then you watched it eagerly for a day or two, and you noted with pleasure that the vine you had lifted up was beginning to take hold of the wood-work itself and warmed by the genial rays of the sun gave promise of complete restoration to life. Then you were happy.

My friends, be as kind to men and women who suffer, who weep, as you were to that plant which knows neither pain nor pleasure. Be as willing to lift up your brother man who has fallen low as you were that vine. Give him as fair a chance. This is Jesus' way. This is practical Christianity.

God's Matchless Love.

But I would not turn away from this parable, without seeing in the Father's attitude toward this jealous and selfish-souled son a very wonderful illustration of God's love. Observe that the father is very patient and kindly with him. "Why son," he says, in substance, "all that I have is yours. This is no time for such a spirit. Your brother whom we have thought of as dead is alive. It is proper that we should rejoice. It is right that we have music and a feast. Come let us go into the house and make merry."

Let us hope that the lad went, that he met his brother becomingly and entered full into the spirit of the occasion. For be assured, if he was not moved by such a display of love on his father's part, no outburst of wrath would move him.

Henry Ward Beecher once had a letter from a man saying, "Preach on hell next Sunday night. I will be there to hear the sermon. I am contemplating taking my own life. Maybe a sermon on such a subject will save me." Mr. Beecher preached from the text: "In my Father's house are many mansions," and began the sermon by saying: If this tender teaching won't save a man from destruction, no other passage possibly can."

I believe that fully, and if this 15th chapter of Luke does not melt the heart of man completely there is none other that can.

The heart-cry of every man and woman who has been lifted out of self into Christ is that of George Matheson:

> "O love that wilt not let me go,
> I rest my weary soul in thee,
> I give thee back the life I owe,
> That in thine ocean depths its flow,
> May richer, fuller be."

Our Readers' Opinions

Denies Fatherhood and Motherhood

In a labored effort to justify a practice of "infant dedication" as a church rite, The Christian Century ("Disciple") says: "Society should be made to feel its responsibility for each new child that enters its communal life. The Motherhood of the Church [capitals those of the author] as the spiritual organ of the social order, needs constant re-emphasis and illumination. It is a reality in religion second only to the fact of the Fatherhood of God." Which means that it is no reality at all. The first great plea of "Disciples" is: "Where the Bible speaks we speak, and where the Bible is silent we are silent." The Bible says nothing of "the Fatherhood of God," nor of the "Motherhood of the Church." Both are manufactured ideas true neither to the Bible nor to common sense. If there is anything more silly than the idea of "the Church" as the Mother of an infant, we have not lighted upon it. —Journal and Messenger (Baptist, Cincinnati.)

Christians But Not Baptized.

Editors Christian Century: I have read your editorials on the question of Christian Unity with a great deal of interest. I admire your courage in making a strong fight for consistency in our efforts to reach the goal for which our movement has its being. I wish, if I may, to express a few thoughts upon this the greatest question confronting the church today. In the first place I have long felt the need of harmonizing our practice with our position on this question. And this leads me to raise the question, are we scripturally justified in our attitude on baptism? I do not refer to the action of baptism, I feel sure that we are justified in that, but as to what is comprehended in its design.

While I agree with you in much you write I think your position on baptism comprehends too much. I know that you are logical in taking the position that, if the immersed are Christians we should not hesitate to fellowship them. I believe that as strongly as you do. But when you undertake to justify your consistency by trying to prove that they have been baptized into Christ I think you are undertaking too much. In a recent editorial you stated something like this: We know of no way to get into Christ except to be baptized into Him. All who are in Christ are Christians. Methodists and Presbyterians are Christians. Therefore they have been baptized into Christ. These may not be your exact words but it is your logic. Now if it is true that there is no other way to get into Christ except to be baptized into him, then you are right, for surely if they are in Christ they must have been baptized into Him. But this is exactly the point I raise. Paul says, "Wherefore if any man is in Christ, he is a new creature; the old things are passed away; behold they are become new."

Now was it not at the time that the old things were passing away that he was really entering into Christ? Or was it not Christ entering into his life through the knowledge of the gospel truth that, at the same time, drove out the old things? so it seems to me. Then the actual fact would be that he actively believed into Christ. This faith must exist in him before it could be manifested in baptism; but he is commanded to express that faith in obedience or baptism. If I understand your position you include this change in your definition of baptism, that is why I think you have enlarged on the meaning of the word.

I believe that the word when used by Christ and the Apostles meant no more than is usually understood by it and that it is the outward expression of the real coming into Christ by faith. According to Wilson's emphatic Diaglott containing Griesbach's Translation of the Greek text of the New Testament you will find the preposition of motion (eis) used in expressing their believing into Christ. They believed into Christ. We are said to be saved by a number of different things in the New Testament, and among these is baptism, but no one would single out baptism and say that by that alone are we saved; neither do I think we are justified in limiting the real coming into Christ to those only who have expressed it in the outward confession of their faith, i. e., in baptism. I would not for a minute favor the discontinuance of our plea for the New Testament use and place of the rite. But I am opposed to making more of it than is implied or taught by the scripture, in order to meet a difficulty which would not seem so great, if the true meaning or design of baptism was understood. I think we are perfectly justified by scripture when we claim that immersion is the only act that can express the design.

But in the light of present day interpretation of Christianity, we dare not take the position that none but immersed believers are in Christ.

Baptism counts for nothing unless it expresses faith in Christ. And that faith may be held, though not expressed by baptism, but is often expressed by or through other forms of obedience to the neglect of baptism. We never neglect baptism but often neglect other forms of obedience, the go precedes the baptism but is often overlooked. I would that our people could see their way clear to fellowship all Christians, though they have not been baptized. I do not look on sprinkling as an irregular baptism. It is not baptism at all. If they are in Christ at all it is because they have believed into Him and I am sure that such is the case though their entrance is not regularly expressed.

poor, and they went on and the way was between fields of corn. And they walked by the path at the side of the road, for many wagons had passed and the dust was thick upon the way.

And as they drew near the place of delight Hannah saw on the other side of the road a man fallen by the way and he could neither stir nor move. The sun beat down upon him and the dust of the road was over him and the feet of the horses passed by his head.

And the child Hannah saw the man, and her soul was filled with loathing, for she knew that he was drunk, and she abhorred him.

And Hannah left the child there in the path and crossed the road and lifted the man's head out of the way of the horses' feet, and picked up his hat that was fallen from him and set it over his eyes so that the sun beat not into his face.

Then the word of the Lord came to the child Hannah, as she stood in the path on the other side of the way, and the Lord said, "All the children of men are my children;" and the child made haste to answer the Lord and she said, "Our Father, thou hast opened mine eyes, and I know that this man is my brother." And the Lord was well pleased with the answer the child had made.

And they two went on, Hannah and the child Hannah, and they came to the place of delight and tarried there a while.

And it came to pass that when Hannah was old and full of years that she died and was buried on the hill near the place of delight.

And she that was the child Hannah went out and came in alone, and the Lord gave her wisdom; and if there were any in that place that walked in darkness, or that fell by the way, she stretched forth her hand to them and helped them and taught them that the Lord God was their Father.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

The Beginning of Women's Organization.

The decade from 1840 to 1850 was a period of reform. It was a time of practical experiment in the doctrines of Socialism, and a number of communities were started to demonstrate their theories. The best known of these was the famous Brook Farm Community, in which some of the most distinguished men and women of the day were associated. The Temperance movement and the Anti-Slavery agitation were at their height then—the reformer was certainly abroad in the land!

Many of them, especially if they were women, were looked on with disfavor, and dwelt in an atmosphere of criticism and caricature. Literature had much to say about them; Dickens wrote his Bleak House about this time, and burlesqued the missionary women in Mrs. Tillyby and Mr. Coterie, whose eyes were so fixed on the West Coast of Africa, that they neglected their own households, and ridiculed the systematic worker among the poor in Mrs. Pardeggle.

Tennyson's Princess.

Tennyson published the Princess, his first long narrative poem in 1847, and chose an advanced woman for his heroine. His treatment of the theme was sentimental, rather than vigorous, but he gave a wider sphere to women than was then granted to her.

"The woman's cause is man's; they sink or rise
Together, dwarfed or godlike, bond or free.
The woman is not undeveloped man,
But diverse.

"Yet in the long years liker must they grow;
The man be more of woman, she of man;
He gain in sweetness, and in moral height,
She mental breadth."

Hawthorne treated the theme more sympathetically than any of the great writers. He was one of the residents of Brook Farm, and perpetuated his memories of it in his Blithedale Romance. His characters are reformers, and the heroine, Zenobia, is a type of the strong minded woman (as the phrase was then) of the times. She is supposed to be drawn from Margaret Fuller, the most brilliant woman of her day. Hawthorne yields to woman all that the most advanced advocate of woman's rights could claim. When Zenobia complains that the right of public speech is denied her, he says:

"I would give woman the widest liberty she has yet dreamed of; I would give her all she asks, and a great deal more, which she will not be a party to demand, but which men, if they were wise, would grant of their own free will."

Hawthorne's Liberal View.

And he then goes on to say, he would give her a share in government and in the church, and adds:

"O, in the better order of things, heaven grant that the ministry of souls be left in charge of women! The task belongs to woman—God meant it for her! He has endowed her with the religious sentiment in its utmost depth and purity, refined from that gross, intellectual alloy with which every masculine theologist has been prone to mingle it."

The denial of the right of public speech, of which Zenobia complained, and of sharing in the public reform movements of the day were the leading causes of the impulse to separate organizations among women. In 1840, a World's Anti-Slavery Convention was held in London, and a number of American women were appointed delegates, and crossed the ocean to share in its deliberations; but they were denied a part in its proceedings, for no other reason than that they were women. Later in the decade, they were refused participation in Temperance Conventions on the same grounds. The most strenuous opponents to women delegates were ministers of the gospel, who claimed that their opposition was based on scriptural authority. They seemed to have overlooked the statement that there was "neither male nor female" in the gospel message, but "all were one in Christ Jesus."

First Woman's Rights Convention.

The thoughtful women rebelled at their indignities, and finally a Woman's Rights Convention was called in Seneca Falls, New York, in 1848, in which Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Lucretia Mott were the leading spirits. The rights that they claimed were considered unwomanly and revolutionary then; but all of them are freely conceded now, except the right of political suffrage, and we can hardly realize that we have not always possessed them. The declaration issued at that first Woman's Convention claimed for them the right to personal freedom, to acquire an education, to earn a living, to own their property and wages, to make contracts, to bring suit, to testify in court, to obtain a divorce for just cause, to have joint ownership in their children—and to equal political rights with men.

The right to personal liberty was not accorded to them then as now. It is said that Margaret Fuller shocked public taste in Boston by sitting down in a public library to read a book. Women seen upon streets in cities, devoted to business conducted by men, like Wall Street in New York, were regarded with suspicion. As has been said, they were barred from sharing in reforms in which they were deeply interested, because they were women. We can all bear testimony to the change since then; the personal liberty that women possess today, to be, to do, to go, and to say what she chooses is one of the debts she owes to the brave leaders sixty years ago.

I wrote two weeks ago of the long fight of woman to acquire an education, and to earn her living, so I need not emphasize that part of the Seneca Falls propaganda.

Woman's Restricted Liberty.

Before this convention, the only woman that the law recognized was the single woman—the married woman had no legal existence; she could not sue or be sued, she had no right to the property she might inherit or earn, she had no right even to the children she might bear—all of her rights were vested in her husband. Space fails me to tell of the great progress along this line—for surely, if slowly in some of the states, the law is according full property rights to women, and recognizing her co-guardianship with her husband of their children.

But the right to full suffrage still lingers. The present status of the political rights of women, with a brief mention of the recent National Woman's Suffrage Convention in Louisville, Kentucky, will be the theme of the next paper.

Woman's Scientific Leadership.

The Nobel Science Prize for $40,000 goes this year to Mme. Curie.

The editor of this page well recalls a day spent in Oxford, England, and her sensations of delight and reverence, as she drove from one college to another, in that most venerable of universities. The spell of eight centuries of learning and history invested them with a glory and glamor all their own. She thought of the statesmen, the warriors, the scientists, the poets and men of letters, who had been trained there, and had gone forth to make England's greatness, and her heart burned within her as she stood where they stood and walked where they walked. But as the day waned, there came a growing feeling of discontent which finally found voice in a request to the driver:

"Show me a woman's college."

The driver was as embarrassed as at an unreasonable demand, and finally said with some resentment:

"Oh, Lady Margaret's Hall!"—and forthwith drove us to a painfully modern brick building, and then to an inadequate and inconspicuous place called Somerville College. These two buildings we found (from the guide-book) had been erected in 1879, and here women are now admitted to lectures and examinations at the University, but are not granted degrees.

As she thought of the splendid provision that the mother country had made for her men for 800 years, and the imperfect facilities for the education of her women for only thirty-two years, her heart burned within her again—but with indignation, not with reverence.

The fellow traveler uttered an emphatic protest against this injustice to her sex in these words:

"Let's go back to London and join the Suffragettes!"

The reproach is often made that we have no women scientists, inventors, composers, artists, etc. How can they do these things unless they be trained, and how can they be trained, with schools of higher learning closed to them!

But in the few years that they have had a chance to secure an education, we are having an increasing list of women who are winning distinction in lines that were once thought to be the sole perquisite of men. Mme. Curie, who has been recently awarded the $40,000 Nobel Chemistry prize is unquestionably one of the most notable scientists in the world. She was the discoverer, with her husband, the late Prof. Curie, of radium, and in 1908 shared with him half of the Nobel prize for physics. Announcement was made recently of her success in producting polonium. The New York Evening Post says:

"The award to Mme. Curie of the Nobel prize for chemistry is a signal distinction. Indeed, the assignment of this great honor and emolument to a person who had already been—though jointly with two others, M. Lecquerel and M. Curie—the winner of a Nobel prize, seemed so extraordinary that one felt a momentary hesitation in accepting it as a fact. That Mme. Curie's work, however, has been of the highest merit and importance in the years that have passed since the discovery of radium by herself and her husband is well known; and the estimate placed upon her researches and upon her ability by fellow-workers in the domain of physics and chemistry has had more than one recent demonstration. In the early part of this year, she missed by only one vote, the honor of election as a member of the Paris Academy of Sciences; and at the International Congress of Radiology, held a year ago at Brussels, it was to Mme. Curie, that the task was committed of preparing a standard specimen of a pure radium salt, to serve as a basis of reference for all workers in radiology. The discoveries she has made since the death of her husband have been such as to dispose completely of the notion, entertained by some, that in her joint work in the discovery of radium her part was subordinate to that of M. Curie—who, himself, of course, has always asserted her claim to a full and equal share in the discovery. But the present award of the Nobel prize fixes beyond possibility of mistake, the achievement by this woman of an undisputed place among the foremost scientists of her time."

A Kitten Puzzle

Grandma was sorry she ever thought of giving the black kitten to Janey and Carolyn, when she learned that they quarreled about its name. Janey wished to name the kitten "Midnight," because it was so black. Carolyn insisted upon calling it "Jetty." The only fact about that kitten upon which the little sisters agreed was its color. It was unquestionably black.

Janey wished the kitten to be fed nothing but milk and begged to keep its bed in the kitchen. Carolyn tried to teach the kitten to eat everything, even oranges; she was glad mother said it must sleep in the woodshed. It did seem as if the little black kitten made more trouble in the family than anything that had ever happened—even measles. Mother threatened to send the pretty creature back to the farm to live with its mother cat and grandma and grandpa.

While mother, father, grandma and grandpa were feeling so bad because Janey and Carolyn quarreled about their pet, no one stopped to think that the kitten was much troubled himself. You see, he didn't know whether he was Midnight or Jetty. Sometimes he thought he was Midnight, and liked nothing but milk to drink; again, he was sure he was Jetty, who preferred bits of beefsteak for dinner. It was extremely puzzling.

One day something happened that never had happened before.

Said Janey: "It's name is Midnight, I tell you."

Said Carolyn: "And I tell you it's name is Jetty."

The kitten had listened to this many times before; but, when Janey made a face at Carolyn, and Carolyn that very minute made a face at Janey, the kitten fled.

One day passed, two days passed, and the kitten failed to return. Janey waited with fresh saucers of milk. Carolyn waited with a feast spread on the woodshed steps.

At last Janey cried. "I am afraid something has happened to our dear kitten," she said, "Oh, if it will only come back, we will call it 'Jetty'!"

"Don't speak of it," answered Carolyn. "If the sweet thing ever comes back, I shall be too glad to call it 'Midnight.' I am afraid it has been killed by dogs."

"Or run over by an automobile," wailed Janey.

"And it is all our own fault," persisted Carolyn. "If we had even said, 'Come back, kitty, kitty, kitty,' that day, I believe it would have stayed at home."

"Instead of doing that," moaned Janey, "I called, 'Come, Midnight, Midnight, Midnight,' and it mewed and ran fast."

"Yes," added Carolyn, "and, when I called, 'Come, Jetty, Jetty, Jetty,' it mewed and ran faster than ever. I believe that kitten knew more'n we supposed."

"Oh, I often saw the little thing wash its face and think at the same time," admitted Janey.

One moonlight evening, when Janey and Carolyn were sitting on the front steps with their arms around each other, who should come walking up the garden path but one black kitten followed by a second black kitten! Midnight and Jetty had come back home, but which is which, neither Janey nor Carolyn knows to this day. All they do know is that grandma's kitten from the country came home with a twin so exactly like himself that even grandma can't tell which one is the farm kitten.

The kitten knows which one he is, because once in a great while, when Janey and Carolyn talk over the past and agree never to quarrel over anything again, one kitten winks at the little girls. Before Janey and Carolyn get over their surprise, the kitten quickly has a game of "tag" with his twin, and three seconds after that no one can tell which kitten winked, because they both look so exactly alike and so pleasant.

Perhaps all kittens would do nothing but purr cheerfully and never mew if they lived with such loving sisters as Janey and Carolyn have been ever since their black kitten left home long enough to think of a way out of his puzzle.—Boys and Girls.

A Prize Corn Raiser

How Jerry Won the World's Championship.

BY MISS A. M. BARNES.

It is a wonderful thing for a boy but little more than fifteen years of age to win the world's championship in a notable achievement, one of genuine value to mankind. Such a record is held by Jerry Moore, of South Carolina. Jerry's score shows two hundred and twenty-eight bushels and three pecks of corn produced on one acre. He thus becomes the champion boy corn-grower of the world.

Jerry is now nearly sixteen years of age, but he had but little more than passed his fifteenth birthday when the wonderful feat of producing two hundred and twenty-eight bushels and three pecks of corn on good old South Carolina soil was accomplished. Jerry lives in Florence County, near a little station known as Winona. He is the son of a Methodist minister, Rev. J. H. Moore, formerly of the Western North Carolina Conference, but now a member of the South Carolina Conference.

So many people, principally newspaper reporters, have been to see Jerry of late, that, to use the homely expression of one of them, the path to the parsonage, close by the little brick church building, known as Liberty Chapel, "is getting mighty slick."

Another reporter gives us this engaging picture of our champion corn-grower: "As we turned in and stopped at the front gate, we knew by the mountain of cornstalks off to one side that we had struck the right place. In front of the barn door there was a little slip of a fellow in blue overalls and brogan shoes. He was tying a hamestring on a big, awkward horse. As he was the only one in sight, we greeted him by asking: 'Are you the fellow who raised the corn?' 'I am the one,' he answered. And here we were face to face with the champion. Jerry Moore is small for his age. He might tip the beam at seventy-five pounds, but it would be close. He is modest, even demure, and does not seem to think it any big thing to be the champion of the world. He showed us his pile of corn, and what a pile it was to come off one acre of land! He had it shucked and planked off in one end of the crib, and overflowing innumerable barrels and boxes besides."

The North Carolina people are very proud of the fact that the seed used by Jerry for this wonderful yield of corn came from that state. It is what is known as Batts' Prolific.

Now all this required both grit and industry on the part of Jerry. He did not win his championship honor and his prizes easily. Nothing was done in a half-handed fashion. Jerry went over his ground again and again. It wasn't an extra bit of soil, as some may suppose. It was no better than hundreds of acres to be found all through the Carolinas. Indeed, Jerry's judges state that it was at the start but "poor, sandy soil." Jerry worked patiently to free it of weeds and brambles, till it was as clean as a parlor floor. Then wagon load after wagon load of manure was hauled and carefully distributed through the soil. All this work Jerry did himself—all the plowing and the hoeing and all the harvesting. What a happy boy he must have been as he saw the rich reward of his patient labor!

It is not given to all boys to attain to such honors as have been won by Jerry Moore; but there is always a reward worth seeking that awaits every one who strives for it with patience and industry.

About a Snail Family

BY BLANCHE ELIZABETH WADE.

Once upon a time a little jelly-like bunch of matter hung upon the stem of a watercress plant in a brook. This globe or jelly-like bunch was as clear as glass, and unless you looked closely you were not likely to see it.

Day after day passed and still the jelly-like matter hung there, and you might not have seen any change in it at all; but a change was really taking place, and soon even you would not have noticed it. By looking carefully, it was possible to see very tiny, round, egg-like divisions, and each egg —for eggs they were—was a small, light-colored dot, no larger than a pin point.

Still more days passed and each dot grew more and more easy to see, for each was growing in size; and then, one day, through a magnifying glass, or even without the glass, you could see the dots move. The glass made it easier to see what the dots looked like, and showed that these dots were shells. Inside each shell was a baby watersnail.

By and by there was no more of the jelly-like matter which kept the eggs. It was needed no longer, for the tiny snails were able to begin setting out upon their travels. This they did right away, and upon the watercress stem they started out to see what they could do for themselves. Slowly they moved. You might have thought each snail but a tiny grain of sand. The baby snails found the watercress leaves made a fine meal, and so the hungry little things set at work upon the tender, green leaves.

Such fun they had! They ate; they crawled up and down the stems; and they grew larger day by day. Having found there was something else in the world besides watercresses, they set out to find new sights on the bottom of the brook. There were other kinds of food, they learned, and there were other creatures besides themselves.

Larger and larger grew the snails, and they

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

M. M. Show has become pastor of the church at Stronghurst.

The Scoville Evangelistic Company is at Pontiac in a great meeting held in a large tabernacle.

The church at Woodson will be pastorless at the end of the year, due to the resignation of W. H. Crain.

The church at West Salem enjoyed the services of W. H. Waggoner in a Bible Institute during the last of November.

At Streator, where C. M. Smithson preaches, there were two additions the nineteenth. Both were by baptism.

New Douglass Church is being led in a meeting at Tomson, assisting the pastor, H. daughter is conducting the music.

Vawter and Marty are holding a revival meeting at Tomson, assisting the pastor, H. W. Thoreson. The meeting opened auspiciously.

A three weeks revival meeting was held at Hazel Dell Church by Steve Owings, which added thirteen to the church, all being by baptism.

A meeting held at Timewell, by E. V. Spicer, was conducted after forty-five additions were received. Mr. Spicer is now in a meeting at Old Union Church, near Madison.

E. U. Smith, who has been pastor of the church at Sandoval, has been called by the church at Windsor and began his new pastorate there the first of December.

Evangelist S. S. Offutt of Indiana has concluded a revival meeting at Brocton, to the satisfaction of the entire congregation and the pastor, C. F. Shaul.

J. A. Clemens of Casey was assisted in the celebration of his birthday by almost half a hundred of his members, who evinced their appreciation of the pastor by presenting him with an overcoat.

At Hamilton, on a special Sunday recently, there were seven additions to the church, and money was raised for liquidating indebtedness incident to repairing of the building. The pastor is J. Ross Miller.

Carbondale Church is enlisted in a revival meeting with its own pastor, Adam K. Adcock as evangelist, and George E. Crist of Ohio as singer. In two weeks there have been twenty-one additions.

The church at Twin Grove near Bloomington, was destroyed by storm near the middle of November. It has not been reported whether the congregation will rebuild, but undoubtedly this will be done.

At Christopher, where W. O. S. Cliffe is peacher, there have been several additions recently. This congregation united with the Methodists on a recent Sunday evening. The latter people and pastor initiated the union service.

The first year of C. F. Shaul's pastorate at Hume has just been concluded, and the annual report showed a total of seventy-four received into the membership of the church, of which number thirty were on profession of faith.

A. P. Cobb of Decatur recently held revival meetings at Hindsboro with fourteen additions, at Rural Retreat with thirty-five additions, and at Bushton with twenty-two additions. Mr. Cobb ministers to these churches regularly.

The church at Carmel, ministered to by W. W. Weedon, is in a prosperous condition. Since the present pastorate began, only two months ago, there have been six additions, and a very hearty response is being given by the community to the minister's message.

Carthage Church is having the leadership of the Harlow Evangelistic Company in a meeting which had resulted in twenty-four additions the first week, with large congregations hearing the minister and manifesting great interest. The pastor is W. W. Denham.

Augusta Church will unite with the other congregations of the city in a sunrise prayer-meeting on Thanksgiving morning. We submit, this is a most appropriate way for celebrating a day which has lost very much of the religious significance it was intended originally to possess.

The great meeting at Mattoon conducted by the pastor, F. B. Thomas, resulted in one hundred-fifty six additions to the church, a large majority of whom were on profession of faith. This is probably the largest meeting held by a pastor in Illinois for many months, and indicates the extensive influence of this pastor in his home city.

N. S. Haynes, of Decatur, is writing a history of the Disciples in Illinois. He will endeavor to make a comprehensive volume. Mr. Haynes is a happy choice for this important work. He is fully conversant with the subject and brings to his task a lucid and unprejudiced mind and an entertaining literary style.

J. F. McMahan, who has been pastor of East End Church, Quincy, since its organization last September, held a week's meeting with home forces, in which there were twelve additions. This new church is growing very rapidly, having increased more than one hundred per cent since its organization. The entire congregation is imbued with an evangelistic spirit.

H. H. Peters, of Eureka, was appointed chaplain of the Grand Lodge of the I. O. O. F. of Illinois last week at the meeting of the Grand Lodge in Springfield. There were about 2,500 Odd Fellows and Rebeccas in attendance. Mr. Peters will do some lecturing during the year in the interest of Odd Fellowship, and would be pleased to hear from lodges in any part of the state.

True Economy

The difference in cost between an alum baking powder and the highest-class cream of tartar baking powder would not amount for a family's supply to one dollar a year.

Dr. Price's is the standard cream of tartar baking powder. It makes the food delicious and healthful.

NOTE.—You cannot, if you value good health, afford to use cheap, low-grade, alum baking powders. They are apt to spoil the food; they do endanger the health. All physicians will tell you that alum in food is deleterious.

W. J. Lhamon, professor of theology in Drury College in Missouri, has been selected to deliver a series of lectures at University Place, Champaign. There is an encouraging prospect that Dr. Peter Ainslie of Christian Temple, Baltimore, will be the lecturer during the second half of the school year. These lectures are made possible by a fund left by will from the Bondurant estate.

S. S. Jones, pastor of Danville Third Church, will hold a meeting for H. J. Hostetler at Newman in January. Mr. Jones has just had the delightful experience of providing for the entire indebtedness on the property of the church for which he is pastor, and in addition to this a sufficient amount is being collected to refurnish the edifice.

The funeral of the late Rev. O. W. Lawrence, formerly pastor of Decatur and Rock Island Churches, was held Sunday December third at Central Church, Decatur, the body having been brought from North Yakima, Washington. The service was in charge of F. W. Burnham of First Church, Springfield, and was attended by a great company of former parishioners and friends throughout the city and central Illinois.

The Union Evangelistic Campaign at Rushville was concluded with something less than six hundred reported conversions. The Christian Church, of which H. L. Maltman is pastor, held a brief meeting following the general revival, assisted by D. E. Hughes of Monmouth. This resulted in ninety additions. Mr. Maltman will continue indefinitely with the congregation, though he had intended accepting a call to his former charge in Michigan. He is now assisting a country church nearby in a revival meeting.

Central Church, Peoria, of which W. F. Turner is pastor, held its annual meeting in November, at which time the pastor's report showed an increase of membership of seventy-seven, with a net increase of fifty-six. For missions, one thousand four hundred eighty-four dollars was contributed, which entitled the church to living-link standing in the Foreign society, and the total contributions of the congregation amounted to six thousand sixty-three dollars. The membership of the church is more than six hundred. During less than three years of labor, the present pastor has succeeded in accomplishing a most excellent work, which gives promise of being more than duplicated in the future.

Secretary's Letter.

J. W. Porter of Carlinville, has accepted a call to Rantoul, January 1.

There were 189 conversions the first three days of invitation in the Scoville meeting at Pontiac. This is a union meeting and B. W. Tate is our minister there.

Gibson City dedicated their splendid rebuilt house of worship and Pastor Lehman is happy and the work prospers.

The Mattoon meeting, F. B. Thomas pastor, resulted in 156 additions, said to be the best meeting ever held there.

A letter just received says: "We have an organization here, but no house, no preacher, no Bible school, only the Ladies Aid Society and we have done very little work for some time, yet we are sending you $4.50 on our apportionment. I only wish I could have sent double the amount, and hope the Lord will bless your work." If four hundred churches in our state would do as well in proportion to ability, what a wonderful work we could do. This is a remarkable example of missionary liberality, and it ought to be a standing rebuke to many churches that are doing little or nothing for Illinois missions.

Thos. E. Israel had three additions at Morganville, and he began a meeting at Sweetwater, the 30th, with the help of G. A. Butler, singer.

Offerings are coming in better this week. Keep them coming fast.

Be careful to send the offerings for Girl's and Boy's Rally Day for American missions, to the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Bldg., Cincinnatti, O. But send the church offering for Illinois missions to this office, payable to the treasurer, W. D. Deweese.

We are greatly shocked and pained to learn of the death of O. W. Lawrence, who recently went from Decatur to take the work at North Yakima, Wash. He was an honored member of our state board up to the time he went from our state. He was a faithful man and truly great preacher of the gospel.

Do your best brethren, for the state offering. Indications are that this will be an off year unless the churches make larger offerings than have been coming in. We must not take a backward step.

J. Fred Jones, Field Secretary.
W. D. Deweese, Office Sec'y-Treas.
Bloomington.

Eureka College

It has been suggested by many of the friends of Eureka College that due recognition should be given in our church papers to the men and women, who made possible the recent campaign for the raising of $125,000 for Eureka College. These friends were known as Sustainers. Four years ago a group of men and women agreed to pay $25 a year each, for five years, to support a man in the field in the interest of Eureka College. A few people made the pledge for one year, others for two years. Three persons, whose names appear in the following list, paid a portion of the first year, but were compelled to give the matter up because of other obligations. We have felt justified, however, in giving the entire list without special mention to any one. The list follows in the order in which the names were secured.

H. H. Peters, Eureka; J. W. Shepard, Paris; F. W. Burnham, Springfield; Luceba E. Miner, Bone Gap; Mark Camp, Harristown; H. H. Jenner, Springfield; John Lemmon, Springfield; Dr. N. B. Crawford, Eureka; D. N. Wetzel, Mattoon; A. J. Elliott, Peoria; O. W. Lawrence, Decatur; J. G. Waggoner, Canton; J. P. Darst, Peoria; Mrs. Maria Ball, Toluca; W. W. Sniff, Paris; Mrs. W. H. Simms, Gibson City; L. B. Pickerell, DeLand; John B. Campbell, LaHarpe; Mrs. Mary Wilson, Lynnville; Mrs. O. W. Stewart, Chicago; Fred Kline, Illiopolis; Mrs. Charlotte Mills, Phoenix, Ariz.; W. H. Waggoner, Eureka; Mrs. M. L. Harper, Eureka; L. H. Coleman, Springfield; Frank Johnson, Oregon; Henry Parish, Harristown; David Wolf, Lanark; B. J. Radford, Eureka; T. J. McGuire, Eureka; J. A. McGuire, Eureka; W. H. Smith, Eureka; J. M. Allen, Eureka; W. B. Stroud, Long Beach, Calif.; R. E. Hieronymus, Eureka; S. G. Harrod, Eureka; W. F. Shaw, Chicago; E. E. Boyer, Eureka; E. M. Peterson, New Bedford; Silas Jones, Eureka; W. F. Aleshire, Plymouth; B. R. Hieronymus, Springfield; Chas. Ireland, Washburn; Mrs. Nancy J. Jones, Niantic; Dr. Fred Pratz, Holly, Colo.; P. A. Felter, Eureka; F. B. Vennum, Champaign; H. C. Reichel, Eureka; Dr. C. U. Collins, Peoria; Mrs. Mary A. Campbell, La Harpe; Thos. Jury, Washburn; Mrs. S. A. Hoyt, Forrest; J. Fred Jones, Stanford; Miss Alma Trumbo, Loami; A. J. Cayton, Youngstown; M. S. Rees, Gerlaw; R. F. Thrapp, Jacksonville; Dr. H. O. Breeden, Fresno, Calif.; J. W. Camp, Eureka; J. P. Lowry, Gibson City; John D. Miller, Shelbyville; W. H. Cannon, Pittsfield; Louis O. Lehman, Gibson City; Peter Whitmer, Bloomington; R. T. Hicks, Pittsfield; H. C. Hawk, Battle Creek, Mich; Giles Bradley, Peoria; Stephen E. Fisher, Champaign; J. P. Hieronymus, Atlanta; Ira S. Whitmer, Bloomington; Mrs. J. O. Wilson, Bloomington; Samuel Collison, Rossville; C. S. Jones, Stanford; S. S. Lappin, Cincinnati, Ohio; B. F. Harber, Bloomington; Robert Ward, Magnolia; John Kauffman, Eureka; Dr. H. B. Boone, Chandlerville; Judge Chas. J. Scofield, Carthage; John Gunzenhauser, Patavia; Mrs. Geo. Pasfield, Springfield; J. P. Henderson, Virden; Dr. J. H. Breeden, Ipava; J. M. Cathcart, Sidell; Mrs. Virginia Hieronymus, White Hall; Dean Blankinship, Patoka; Geo. L. Warlow, Fresno, Calif.; Clarence L. DePew, Jacksonville; W. M. Groves, Petersburg; N. S. Haynes, Decatur; I. Coriell, L. E. West, Rock Island; S. S. Tanner, Minier; W. T. Browlie, Davenport, Ia.; Alonzo Eyman, Decatur; E. B. Dickinson, Eureka; R. J. Dickinson, Eureka; R. V. Calloway, Havana.

A new campaign will be inaugurated January 1, 1912, to continue three years. A movement is being considered to create another sustaining group on the same basis to support this campaign. Many who have been helping the college in this way will permit the last year of the five years' campaign to be the first year of the three years' campaign and will extend the pledge to the end of the seven years from the beginning of this work. We will doubtless be able to secure enough new contributors for the three years' campaign to make our list complete, so that we will not have to draw upon the general fund of the college to support the campaign. Brother W. M. Groves, of Petersburg, who was one of the Sustainers for the first campaign, has paid his pledge for the full five years, and has stated that he and his wife will become Sustainers for the three years' work beginning January 1 next. This matter will be taken up by the Trustees at the January meeting, but we would be pleased to hear from any of the present Sustainers or friends of the college concerning the matter.

H. H. Peters.

Dedication Services at Gibson City.

The new church building at Gibson, which has been the objective of our work for this year, is rapidly being furnished and will be dedicated with appropriate exercises, Sunday, December 10. S. E. Fisher of Campaign, a former minister of the church, will preach morning and evening of that day, and the church is looking forward to one of the greatest days in its history. In connection with the dedication, special services, lasting nearly a week, will be held. It is planned to have W. W. Sniff, of Paris, and J. R. Golden, of Springfield, and other former ministers of the church, present during the week, to speak at different services. Clarence L. Depew, and H. H. Peters will be present one day for a conference of the Sunday-school and Christian Education. For the closing day, the church has secured Dr. A. L. Shelton of Batang, Tibet, with his wonderful message of missionary service and sacrifice.

The new building is a very substantial building in mission style, finished with rough coat cement or pebble dash in white cement. The old church has been utilized in the new, but the whole building has been worked over until the old is scarcely discernable, and the whole structure is quite harmonious and convenient. The plan has been, to build a workshop for the Sunday-school and church, and it has been pronounced by a Sunday-school expert to be better adapted for its work than other buildings costing as high as $40,000. The improvement will cost approximately $15,000, three fourths of which is already provided for.

L. O. Lehman, Pastor.

A wise snail always makes use of everything he learns. It was not long before each snail knew all the things about a brook that every snail knows. One thing was this: That snails must keep the brook as clean as possible by eating such things as fishes and other creatures do not eat. Each of this small family set about this task, and sometime, if you will go and look down into a little brook, you will see happy brown snails going slowly but steadily, about their work, for every snail is a wise fellow.—Churchman.

Church Life

James Small will lead the church at Tampa, Fla., in a meeting beginning December 10. E. W. Elliott is pastor.

National superintendent, Robert M. Hopkins reports that the offerings for Amarican missions from the Sunday-schools are coming in encouragingly.

W. C. Bower, pastor of Wilshire Boulevard Church, Los Angeles, Calif., is preaching a series of sermons on "Nation Building, or Christian Ideals as Factors in Citizenship."

J. M. Rudy held an evangelistic meeting for the church at Sweet Springs, Mo., G. E. Shanklin, pastor. Twenty-nine persons responded to the invitation in two weeks. Mr. Rudy began a similar meeting at Danville, Ind., December 3.

The Sunday-school of the church at Tipton, Ind., held its annual rally recently and had 860 prsent, it being the largest Sunday-school ever held in the county. The Men's Bible class taught by the pastor of the church, G. I. Hoover, had 164 in attendance.

The church at Tipton, Ind., has an organized department of Teacher Training, which has been offering courses on biblical and religious subjects during the past three years. The courses lead to a diploma granted by the State Sunday-school Association. The second annual recognition service was held on Monday evening, Nov. 13, Garry L. Cook delivering the recognition address. About fifty have been enlisted in the classes during the past year. G. I. Hoover is pastor at Tipton.

George L. Snively followed the successful dedication of the new $40,000 church edifice at Boise, Ida., in which $21,000 was raised on dedication Sunday, with the dedication of a house for the congregation at Nowata, Okla., on Dec. 3. He is to lead in similar services at Bloomfield, Ia., Dec. 17, where A. W. Prentice is pastor. On Dec. 24, Mr. Snively will dedicate at Knobnoster, Mo., and follow these services by a meeting to last through the holidays. W. E. Britton is pastor at Knobnoster.

A local newspaper gives an editorial mention of the evangelistic meeting being conducted at the Christian Church, Vinita, Okla., by J. B. Hunley and Mrs. Hunley. "These meetings," says the editor, "have been carried on quietly, without any unnecessary noise or blare of trumpets but gradually the city is waking up to the fact that a genuine revival is in progress in Vinita. All over the city people are discussing the revival and knots of men on the streets may be heard talking about what is going on up at the Christian Church. Stripped of the usual clap-trap methods of some evangelists, Mr. Hunley is a very forceful gospel preacher and is making an impression in Vinita that will last."

Central Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., passed all previous records on Sunday, November 26 in its offering for home missionary interests, over $200 being received. This church gave $750 to foreign missions in June, supporting Alexander Paul in Wuhu, China. With the C. W. B. M. offerings this church will be giving over $1,000 to missions this year. The Payne Avenue church also gives over $1,000 to missions. Verle W. Blair is pastor at the latter church. George B. Evans, who but recently went to Central Church from Chagrin Falls, Ohio, writes that "the Niagara frontier believes in missions" and

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

Your Friend-- The Christian Century

When you think of your friends to whom you wish to make Christmas presents, do not forget your constant and intimate friend—The Christian Century.

We feel so secure in your affection that we make bold to suggest what gift would please us most. We do not ask you to buy anything for us. But if you would devote a little of your time and get a list of new subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY it would please us more than any other thing.

And this is a gift in which we could reciprocate. Your own paper would be more valuable to you; and your friends whose subscriptions you received—think how they would be benefitted throughout the year!

Christmas time offers an ideal opportunity for all the friends of The Christian Century who have on many occasions expressed their appreciation in words to express it in a practical deed. You can help make a greater paper, if you will. Begin to talk with your friends now.

If you send a list of five or more you may have a good commission on each new subscription.

says that Central Church, but ten years old, has a splendidly equipped plant and not a cent of encumbrance.

Grand Avenue Church, Minneapolis, has just closed one of the most successful meetings in its history. There were fifty-two additions. The meeting lasted just two weeks and was held with home forces. The minister, H. G. Connelly was the evangelist and was ably supported by his talented wife, who had charge of the music and personal work.

Wabash Ave. Church, Kansas City, is leading the men of its community representing all the churches into an enterprise of practical united effort. There are four other churches in the neighborhood, Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregationalist. Two weeks ago the official board of the Wabash Ave. Christian Church sent an invitation to the men of the other churches, asking them to unite in the forming of a Men's Club, to be composed of men from all five of the churches in the community. All the churches accepted the invitation, and on Monday evening, Nov. 20, about fifty representative men came together at the Wabash Ave. Church, freely discussed the advisability of such an organization, elected temporary officers, and appointed committee on permanent organization. The purpose of this organization, stated briefly is, "To do whatever needs to be done by the men of this community." These men all expressed a desire to co-operate with one another because they have unity of purpose. "We are expecting good things from this company of men." says Pastor L. J. Marshall. "You may hear more of us later."

H. H. Peters, endowment secretary of Eureka college, Eureka, Ill., recently assisted the Norwood (Ohio) church in some special work in behalf of their new house of worship. Though engaged in this work during the day, he also preached each evening during one week. The union evangelistic campaign conducted by M. H. Lyon and his assistants had previously closed. As a result of these two meetings, there were fifty-eight additions to the church, making seventy-eight since the first of the year. The Sunday-school is the largest in its history, and the church was never more hopeful or the outlook more promising. The brief ministry of Mr. Peters is described by W. J. Shelburne, the pastor, as "an inspiration to the church. His messages were thoughtful and practical, emphasizing the social as well as individual claims of Jesus. Though the meeting was in a way incidental, being so brief, and little or no personal work being done, the church was stimulated and strengthen, aside from the additions, and hopes to have him back at some later date to lead in another and longer campaign."

The Men's club of B. S. Ferrall's church, Buffalo, N. Y., recently was entertained at the parsonage and carried out the following interesting program. It will have suggestion in it for other clubs and pastors to follow: Invocation. Song. Recitation of 23rd Psalm. Song. Business Session. Roll Call. Committee reports. Unfinished and new business. Introduction and reception of new members. Recess and refreshments, music by orchestra. Reassembling of Club and singing "The Church in the Wildwood." Five minute talk by club president on "Loyalty to our Organization," our obligations to it, etc. Music by Mendelssohn quartette. Five minute talk on "The Men and Religion Forward Movement, how extend it in our own community?" W. H. Leonard. Five minute talk by S. H. Rohrer on "Friendship the Master Passion." Song by Club. Five minute talk on "The Thing we Need to do Now," Chas. Obensheimer.

The Best

Did you know that the Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 will be in The Life of Christ? That means that you will want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition is now being prepared to meet the great demand expected this fall. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

Fowler, Colo., church is planning a new edifice.

J. E. Dinger is holding a meeting in Central Church, Dallas, Tex.

The latest church-built-in-a-day is at Royal Heights, near Joplin, Mo.

South Texas district convention was held at Lockhart, Nov. 30 to Dec. 3.

The church house at Jamestown, Ind., was destroyed by a high wind storm recently, with a loss of $3,500.

J. G. Slayter of Minneapolis addressed a company of 200 men at a Men and Religion banquet at Albert Lea, Minn.

Ninety-four have been added in R. W. Abberley's meeting at Broadway Church, Lexington, Ky.

Carey E. Morgan, for nine years pastor at Paris, Ky., has accepted a call to Vine Street Church, Nashville, to succeed P. Y. Pendleton.

The Scoville revival in Pontiac, Ill., is a union meeting, embracing Methodist, Presbyterian, Lutheran, Baptist and Christian churches.

The Fife Evangelistic Company closed a successful meeting with Elmer Ward Cole at Huntington, Ind., and are now holding forth at Owensville.

The new house of worship for the Christian church, Knoxville, Ia., will be the best religious building in the city. It will be ready for occupancy soon.

Atchison, Kan., Church has received plans from George Kramer, the New York church architect, for its new edifice. The building will probably be delayed until spring.

A new church is likely to be established in Lincoln, Nebr. The joint boards of the several congregations have been taking counsel on the matter. An unchurched district invites them where there are already 195 Disciples residing.

The newest department in the Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, is the nursery, where mothers can leave their babies when they are in church. A matron will be in charge under the direction of the Ladies' Aid Society.

A special correspondent of the Chicago Record-Herald has been writing up the colleges of this central section. He gave several columns recently to Butler College, Indianapolis, dwelling particularly upon the high standards the school has always maintained.

Two weeks of evangelistic lectures are in progress at Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, of which Burris A. Jenkins is pastor. The lectures are being given by Z. T. Sweeney, former American consul-general at Constantinople during the McKinley administration.

Sunday, Dec. 10, has been set apart as the date for formally installing Benj. L. Smith to the pastorate of Moberly, Mo., church. Mr. Smith goes there from Salina, Kan. He was formerly corresponding secretary of the American Missionary Society. F. W. Richardson, of Kansas City, will preach the installation sermon.

H. P. Williams has a unique advertising asset in the meeting his brother, Mark Wayne Williams, is conducting for him in Albuquerque, N. M. This asset is the evangelist's poetry, which his pastor brother publishes in the church paper and elsewhere with good effect—because it is good poetry. The meeting is progressing successfully.

An enthusiastic welcome was tendered S. Walton Fay, new pastor of the Christian Church at Valley Junction, Ia., by the people of his parish and others of the faith in Des Moines. A musicale and social gathering was given in his honor in the church parlor. Mr. Fay recently came to them from England.

O. F. Jordan, pastor of the Christian Church, spoke at the union Thanksgiving service in First Methodist Church of Evanston. "I believe there should be a union of religion and politics," he said. "I believe the functions of government and the functions of religion are far from being divorced. This holiday seems to me to be the greatest day of all, for it is not only a religious day but also a patriotic day."

Chicago Heights Church is engaged in a Sunday-school contest. They are taking a trip to the Holy Land in two boats, the Lusitania and the Mauretania. On a recent Sunday the Mauretania had 140 on board and the Lusitania 144. At the close of the contest 362 were present and the collection amounted to over $63. They will have a return trip of the two boats. The recent meeting held by J. G. Slater of Minneapolis resulted in sixty-eight additions to the church.

S. Grundy Fisher, pastor at Trenton, Mo., speaks in his church paper of D. Y. Donaldson, the state secretary, as a "prophet." This is what our states are needing, men who can see the big opportunities and obligations of their task, who know how to do more than keep the machinery going. That Mr. Donaldson's visit to Trenton should have thus impressed the people and pastor of that church is a significant fact. Mr. Fisher's work is prospering in every way.

The note recently published in these columns from F. Coop, of Southport, Eng., calling for a pastor for the church made famous by the philanthropy of Timothy Coop and the ministries of W. T. Moore and J. H. Garrison, has resulted in pulling from this land one of our best known pastors, G. W. Buckner, of Canton, Mo. Mr. Buckner will begin his work in England January 1. He will prove admirably fitted to his new field. In a letter from Mr. Coop he says the new pastor ought to be sound: he comes recommended by Drs. Willett, Garrison and McLean!

Mrs. Frank Wells, of Indianapolis, president of the Indiana Christian Woman's Board of Missions and vice-president of the Indianapolis Young Women's Christian Association, was the principal speaker at the annual banquet of the South Bend, Ind., Y. W. C. A. She spoke on the subject, "The Privileges, Responsibilities and Opportunities of Womanhood." To the two hundred women assembled Mrs. Wells urged the duty to realize the fullest possibilities of their natures. She pointed out the good they might do for their city and for the association.

The new church house at Stockport, Ia., will be ready for dedication soon.

H. O. Pritchard and L. C. Oberlies are in a meeting at Bradshaw, Nebr., where E. H. Longman is the popular preacher.

The Texas Christian Lectureship was held at Denton the last week of November. B. A. Abbott of St. Louis was the principal lecturer.

Mayor Shank, of Indianapolis, was auctioneer at the sale of the old property of the Hillside Church, of which Charles M. Fillmore is pastor. The highest bid was $700.

Rock Island, Ill., Maryville, Mo., and Decatur, Ill., newspapers all contain lengthly accounts of the death of O. W. Lawrence, who died in North Yakima, Wash., recently, and testify editorially to the great affection in which their communities held him. These three cities were the scenes of his former pastoral labors.

The church at Niantic, Ill., closed a very successful revival of two weeks duration Oct. 22. The services were conducted wholly by home forces. The singing was under the direction of the regular chorister, Miss Olive Stahl, who had a chorus of more than thirty and an orchestra of six pieces. There were fifteen additions to the church, all adults. Robt. E. Henry is the efficient pastor.

Robt. A. Sickles, who has held a successful pastorate at Illiopolis, Ill., for the past three years, has had good evidence recently that his work is being appreciated. The board and congregation have extended him a unanimous call to remain with them for the next three years. Mr. Sickles has done a progressive work in this field and it is a matter of congratulation to his congregation that it is to be continued without interruption.

Charles S. Earley closed his meeting with the Belleville, Kan., Church, Nov. 26. A. E. Buss, his singer, left to begin his work as singing director in W. H. Book's church at Columbus, Ind. Mr. Earley speaks very heartily of Mr. Buss. "Our fellowship," he says, "was most satisfactory. He is a splendid man, with great ability and is using it to a good purpose. The church at Columbus is to be congratulated on securing his services." Mr. Earley began a meeting last Sunday at Hill City, Kan.

The First Church, Rochester, Ind., celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its house of worship by dedicating its building remodeled, suited to modern needs for progressive church work. The building has been raised five feet from the old foundation, and an eight-foot basement placed under the entire structure. It has also been re-roofed, repainted and re-decorated in an artistic manner. The building as its stands now, both in appearance and arrangement, is a credit to our plea in this community. E. S. Farmer is pastor.

The marriage of Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair, president of Christian College, Columbia, Mo., to Dr. Woodson Moss, physician of the University of Missouri, took place Nov. 22. The ceremony was performed at Christian College by Rev. Madison A. Hart, pastor of the Christian Church, and Rev. W. Jasper Howell, pastor of the Baptist Church in Columbia. Dr. and Mrs. Moss left for New Orleans, where Mrs. Moss will deliver an address before the Southern Educational Association. As the couple left all of the Christian College girls in white dresses surrounded the carriage and sang college songs. Mrs. Moss has been president of the college since its leadership was relinquished several years ago by Mrs. W. T. Moore. Prior to that time she was president of Hamilton College, Lexington, Ky. Doctor Moss is a member of a pioneer Missouri family and for several years has taught medicine at the university. The Christian Century extends sincere congratulations.

"There are hours in every life and lives in every generation which belong to the common good. No life, indeed, belongs anywhere else except as by devoting it to the individual self it tends to make that self more fit for general service. We must get to give, we must climb that we may lift, we must be strong to aid the weak: that is the law of the kingdom."

Status of New York's Union Movement

In the Visitor's department on another page, Dr. Willett tells of his recent short stay in New York City and of the plans of the two congregations in Manhattan Island to get together. The congregational meetings held to bring about this union, resulted in a unanimously favorable vote in First Church, and a close division in Lenox Avenue Church, with fifty-five to fifty-one against the union. Those in the Lenox Avenue Church, favorable to the union, feel their duty to be so urgent and plain that they have decided, in the best of Christian spirit, to unite with First Church in forming the new congregation as originally proposed to be called Central Church, Disciples of Christ. A communication is at hand signed by R. A. While, P. F. Jerome, Geo. D. Briggs and J. A. Stitt on behalf of these members, which after reciting certain facts already known to our readers, reads as follows:

"After the congregational meetings, some of us of the Lenox Avenue Union Church met with the officers of the First Church to see what might yet be done toward the ad-

The Divinity of Christ

is the new work on religion by EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES which bids fair to be even more generally discussed than the same author's "Psychology of Religious Experience."

It is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

vancement of this forward movement; for it appeared to many that this greater work should not be forsaken because of the community interest prevailing in the one church. The Official Board of the First Church by unanimous vote agreed to accord to us all the privileges suggested and proposed in the contract which would have become effective had that contract been accepted by our congregation, on November 8, 1911, with the sole exception that it is now clearly understood that we are to carry with us none of the physical assets of the church. They made it very clear that this proposition was not made as an inducement to entice us away from our present congregation with the object of merely strengthening their congregation; but that the proposition was agreed to solely in the interest of the greater work in which the two forces might unite in a reorganized movement and under a new name.

"Now in view of the foregoing facts and believing that the greatest interest of the brotherhood at large and of the cause of Christ in New York City will be best served by so doing, a number of us of the Lenox Union Church have indicated by signature our desire and purpose to unite our efforts with those of the First Church in the reorganized movement to be known as the Central Church of the Disciples of Christ in New York City."

The "declaration" closes by affirming the complete confidence of the dissenting group in the good faith of those who decline to enter the union. It is regrettable that this union could not have been completely carried out, and one commanding church established in New York City.

Association of Evangelists in St. Louis.

The Executive committee of the National Association of Evangelists have authorized a meeting of the Association to be called for St. Louis, Missouri, Wednesday, December 27, 1911, in the committee room of the Christian Board of Publication. Meeting will convene at nine o'clock, a. m., with the president, W. T. Brooks, in the chair.

This is the second meeting of the National Association of Evangelists; the first meeting being held at the time of organization at the Portland convention. All evangelists, singing evangelists and evangelistic pastors, interested in the work of evangelism, whether members of the National Association of Evangelists or not, are cordially invited to be present at this meeting. A constitution and by-laws for the association will be presented and acted upon.

E. E. Elliott, Secretary.

Notes from the Foreign Society.

By Secretary F. M. Rains.

A. F. Hensey, of Bolenge, Africa, writes on September 29, "The evangelists came in with such a host as we had never seen before and we wrote the names of 300 inquirers that day. The next night the evangelists told the story of their three months' work and what a story it was!"

The missionaries in Africa have been having a most remarkable conference. During the conference 192 were baptized. 174 of these were from Bolenge and eighteen from Longa. On the Sunday of the conference, there were 1016 in the Bible-school. Forty-four missionaries and about 1200 natives attended the conference.

C. P. Hedges after full time on the Congo is returning home on furlough. He has done good work. After a season of rest he will return to the field.

R. E. Eldred of Longa, Africa, writes "The school is increasing in numbers as well as in interest. I have established the teaching of French as a part of the course. The regular school is in the native language. At present I have twenty-five in the French class. The interest is very good indeed. Those who attend this class are, for the most part, those who are farthest advanced in the other school."

Dr. W. N. Lemmon of the Philippines writes that in the month of September, the work was hindered by storms. The rivers were higher than for years past. Dr. Lemmon reports five baptisms. The Laoag church is now self-supporting. It is paying enough to support its own pastor. The medical work was not materially affected by the storms. The hospital was almost full all the time. 1,046 patients were treated during the month. Twenty-six operations were performed. Five outside towns were visited. 3,000 tracts were distributed. 157 homes were visited.

Bruce L. Kershner of the Philippines reports that the semi-annual Bible Intitute for evangelists and workers in all Tegalog has just closed. It was held at the mission house in Manila and was attended by about twenty delegates. These with others from the school brought the enrollment up to twenty-three. The Institute lasted over six days. Many of the delegates slept and were fed at the mission house. Interest in all the classes was good. The last night of the Institute there was a distribution of certificates and rewards. A certificate was given to all who were enrolled, a hymnal to all who tried the examinations, and a set of boooks in English to each of the three young men who attained to a higher degree of proficiency.

Bruce L. Kershner of the Philippines writes "Work at the Central station is moving along well. Last Sunday we had 130 in the Sunday-school and chapel and mission house and organized a new school on Calle Constantia. The brethren in Tondo could be organized into a congregation now soon if we had a qualified evangelist to take charge. We have had baptism in Central almost every week for about two months.

Miss Stella Walker Lewis of Japan is visiting among the churches of Linn and Benton counties, Iowa, at the request of these churches. Mrs. Garst is with her. They have been well received in all the churches. The services they hold will bear fruit for many years to come.

M. B. Madden and family have changed from Sendai to Osaka, Japan. Osaka is one of the great cities of the world. The station of the society is within five minutes' walk of the largest Buddhist temple in the empire.

Some changes have been made in the location of the missionaries in India. David Rioch and family go to Damoh. H. A. Eicher and family go to Harda, Dr. Fleming to Harda, O. J. Grainger and family to Mungeli after the first of March.

A friend in Ohio sends $700 for the work of the Foreign Society on the Annuity Plan. This is her third gift and the sum is $3,200.

Joseph Franklin, who has two daughters in India missionaries of the Foreign Society, is ill in Cleveland where he abides with his daughter. This brave soldier looks out on the whole harvest field with intelligence and rejoices in very step.

The State Conventions in the Southland were completely cantivated by the splendid addresses of Dr. A. L. Shelton of Batang, Tibet. He returns to his distant field of labor with his family in the near future. It will require more than four months to make the long journey.

Two mission study books have just been issued by the Foreign Society. "The Social Work of Christian Missions" by Alva W. Taylor and "Ten Lessons in World Conquest" by Stephen J. Corey. These will be the special books for this year. It is believed each will fill a unique need. 500 copies of these two books have already been sent out four days after publication. Mr. Taylor's book in cloth, 265 pages, sells for fifty cents, postage ten cents extra. Mr. Corey's bok, 100 pages in boards, twenty-five cents. In parcels of five or more, twenty cents postpaid.

Our Field Glass

This time we are looking through a surveyor's theodolite. The field is Montana: That new commonwealth has just been awarded, at Madison Square, N. Y., four prizes out of nine, given for the largest yield and finest quality of agricultural products in the United States. They were for wheat, oats, alfalfa, and barley—two of these from the Gallatin valley, of which Bozeman is the chief city.

That state also felicitates herself on her heroic men. The longest list of awards from Carnegie's fund for heroism in 1911 belongs to Montana.

What of Home Mission survey? Facts, facts, facts, and only facts, are sought concerning the religious condition of thirteen states between Wisconsin and the Pacific ocean and lying in two tiers along Canada's border and parallel to it. In that territory Montana holds first place for size, with an area of 146,240 square miles.

The population in 1910 was 376,053, an increase of 132,724 in ten years. To this scattered population only 273 preachers minister. Representatives of all Protestant bodies in the state agree that between 20,000 and 50,000 people live five miles or more from any place of Christian worship.

Sixteen ministers from different parts of the state claimed acquaintance with adults, born and reared in Montana, who have never heard a sermon. Examples of these were reported twenty miles from Helena, the capital.

No village, town or cities were reported "over-churched." The few cities of the state show a lack of accommodations for worship. The seating capacity of such is but twenty per cent of the inhabitants.

Foreigners are choosing Montana for homes. Of the nationalities represented, there are Austrian, Canadian and Norwegian, 9,000 each; Danes, 3,000; German, 28,000; Irish, 43,000; English, 47,000; Italian, 46,000; Swedish, 13,000; Scotch, 10,000; French, 1,700; Swiss, 2,000; Welsh, 1,100; Finns, 1,500; Hungarians, 1,000; Bohemians, Poles and Russians, each 700; others unclassified, 700.

Here is one of the greatest mission fields in the world—none excel it in importance and promise to the kingdom of God.

The Disciples of Christ are led by a competent company of self-sacrificing leaders. They need reinforcement and thousands of dollars to enter places unprovided with gospel privileges. The American Christian Missionary Society helped organize, last year, eleven new churches for them. Lewiston has just dedicated a $10,000 house. Frank Maples has a prosperous mission in South Billings, where there is only one other church among four thousand people. A choice building site has been paid for and part of the money subscribed for a house of worship Brother Faulders of Kansas becomes pastor in North-Side, December 1.

Bozeman becomes a living link in the Home Society. I. N. McCash, Secretary.

The Gospel of the Kingdom

For Young People's and Adult Classes

The enthusiasm with which so many adult Sunday school classes have taken up the gospel of the Kingdom series this fall prompts us to present the outline of subjects for the entire year of 1912. The lessons come in the form of a monthly magazine—not quarterly, but monthly—at 50c a year. Dr. Josiah Strong is the editor of the series. Problems relating to men, women and the home are uppermost the coming year. The magazine is adapted to both men and women, whether young people or older folks. Send 5c in stamps for a single copy of the magazine.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The Graded Lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' and Primary Departments are fully completed. Three of the four Junior grades are complete. Fourth year Junior pupils may use either third year Junior lessons or first year Intermediate. Two of the four Intermediate grades are complete, and these materials may be used for the entire Intermediate Department. For Senior and Adult Departments, Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus" is provided. Other Adult classes may use Dr. Strong's "The Gospel of the Kingdom."]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

EVERY LESSON WRITER IS A RECOGNIZED AUTHORITY IN THE INTERDENOMINATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL WORLD!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that co-operation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing. You need every one of this splendid list.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

OF PERENNIAL INTEREST TO DISCIPLES.

HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS ADVOCATING CHRISTIAN UNION

Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic literary product of the Disciples' first century of history. Thousands have been sold and the volume is enjoying a steady demand. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Barton W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Price, $1.00.

Z. T. Sweeney says:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

AN ILLUMINATING BIT OF AMERICAN CHURCH HISTORY.

THE EARLY RELATION AND SEPARATION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPES

By Errett Gates, Ph. D.

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 35c.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature."—The Christian Worker.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—The Congregationalist.

A FASCINATING RELIGIOUS STORY.

ALTAR STAIRS

By Charles J. Scofield.

An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound and illustrated. Price, $1.00.

"A most excellent serial."—J. H. Garrison.
"An admirable story."—J. J. Haley.
"A most forceful and healthful piece of reading."—Z. T. Sweeney.
"If one begins this book he will not put it down until the very satisfactory end is finished."—Christian Observer.
"A strong book and worthy of unqualified endorsement."—Religious Telescope.

BOOKS BY HERBERT L. WILLETT

BASIC TRUTHS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH

Cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75c; paper, 35c.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style.

"For me the finest chapter in the book is that on the Resurrection. This gets one back into the lives of the Apostles on that Resurrection morn. It is a historical study indeed. One hears the tread of conquering hosts and the beating of the wings of twelve legions of angels."—P. C. Macfarlane.

"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

OUR PLEA FOR UNION AND THE PRESENT CRISIS

Cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50c. Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period. The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

STUDIES IN THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL

Cloth, $1.00.

One of the volumes in the Constructive Series of handbooks. It is prepared for the use of classes in secondary schools and in the secondary division of the Sunday-schools. It presents the entire material of First Samuel with explanatory notes, questions, and illustrations. It is used in a large number of Sunday-schools, in grades of the ages of eleven to fourteen.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE BOOKS

Cloth, $1.25.

An introduction to the literature of the New Testament. The book is a work of collaboration with James M. Campbell, D. D., a prominent Congregational minister, who supplies the interpretative material in connection with each of the books of the New Testament. A handbook widely used by individual students and classes.

THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF JESUS

Cloth, 35 cents.

A small handbook prepared for classes desiring to study the outline of the life of Christ, and a brief statement of the most important teachings of the Master. It is based upon the entire material of the four Gospels arranged in chronological order.

THE PROPHETS OF ISRAEL

Cloth, 35 cents.

A handbook on this, the most important theme of the Old Testament. It gives a survey of the history of prophecy in Israel from the beginning of the national life to the close of the Maccabæan age. It has been widely used in institutions of education and in Bible classes, and has passed through several editions.

THE RULING QUALITY

Board, 35 cents.

A small book of sixty pages dealing with faith as the conquering quality in human life. The theme is interwoven with comments upon the quest of the Holy Grail as illustrated in Mr. Abbey's panels.

Speech Laden With the Eternal

GEORGE A. CAMPBELL, writing of Rev. C. M. Chilton, president of the American Missionary Society, refers feelingly to Mr. Chilton's voice. He says the impression made upon him by that voice when he first heard it, perhaps twenty years ago, abides with him still. "No other voice was like Chilton's. It was then, and is more so now, laden with the eternal. It raises emotions in your soul as do the many waters of the sea."

To the host of those who have sat under the ministry of the St. Joseph pastor these words of his friend will seem a most happy interpretation. One never hears this preacher but one comes away with a sense of the eternal importance of his message. It is this power to make life serious, to interpret its infinite meaning to the souls of men, that is the genius of Mr. Chilton's preaching and of any prophetic ministry. And it is not amiss to lodge this power in the voice, provided only the voice is taken not simply as a physical instrument of tone but a carrier of the preacher's own spiritual life.

We have heard many voices equal in fullness and depth to that of Mr. Chilton, and quite as pleasing in their richness of overtone, which did not seem particularly "laden with the eternal." They stirred within our soul no such emotions "as do the waters of the sea." Mr. Chilton's power is not in his vocal endowment, nor in his vocal art. It is not his voice that glorifies his speech; it is his speech that glorifies his voice.

"I am fond of my pastor," said a discriminating layman, "but I wish he would take his preaching seriously." Pressed for an explanation, he said his pastor did not seem to study earnestly, that he dealt mainly in his preaching with the practical duties of church membership—going to church, teaching in the Sunday-school, giving money, and so forth, and that when he did strike a vein of rich thinking it usually led straight to some funny story, whose incongruous connection spoiled the whole sermon. This layman said he rarely passed out of the sanctuary except with a sense of lack. No great word had been spoken, no seriously prepared word, whose meaning took hold on the eternal.

It is a great day in the soul of a preacher when he learns that people are fundamentally earnest, that they can be presumed to be interested in the infinite, that they do not go to church to be entertained, that they are capable of comprehending something beside the pragmatic details of so-called church work, and that there is nothing true and living which interests his soul but it will also interest them. One of the most obvious weaknesses in many a preacher's speech is that he does not choose big enough subjects. There are only a few themes for the preacher, but these reach out far into the eternal. And the preacher who meditates upon them, who lives in them, will preach upon these themes with exhaustless variation, coming into his pulpit with his face shining like Moses' face when he had been speaking with God in the mount.

But this presence of the eternal in any man's speech is far from being explained by mere intellectual occupation with themes that are of eternal importance. Such a preacher as Mr. Campbell described Mr. Chilton to be is always a man who is himself dealing in tremendous moral earnestness with the problems of his own soul. A preacher is not simply a speaker, a scholar, a teacher; he is primarily a human soul, living precisely the same human life as his parishioners, meeting essentially the same problems and temptations, albeit often more subtle and undiscerned. There is no spectacle more pathetic and repellant to earnest-minded men than that of a preacher who imagines that he can charge his speech with the eternal by cultivating his voice! It is not the preacher's voice that needs cultivating, it is his soul. Earnestness is not an elocutionary effect.

But let the preacher watch his own soul's life. Let him meet his own personal problems Christianly. Let him guard his motives from professionalism. Let him take good care that Christian truth does not become to him merely the stuff to make sermons out of, instead of the stuff to make his own life out of. Let him treat himself with moral earnestness, and his voice will take care of itself; his very lack of elocution will stir emotions in his hearers as do the many waters of the sea.

There is one element in the St. Joseph pastor which his interpreter suggested and which must be regnant in any fruitful ministry: a constructive, evangelical purpose. The preacher of Christ is not simply a man with a subject; he is a man with an object. It is not simply his business to deliver himself of his ideas, but to build up human life and the Kingdom of God. Too many preachers are content with analyzing problems, the problems of social conditions, or the problems of metaphysics, or the problems of the psychology of religion. The results of their ministry are chiefly the disillusionment of their people, the breaking of the charm of faith, and often the disintegrating of the congregational organism.

The eternal is not found by analysis. The sociologist, the psychologist, the theologian do not find God. No science finds God. God lies in the opposite direction from that in which science moves. This is no reflection upon science. Her work must be done; it is invaluable; it clears the path for true religion. But the way to God is not by the analysis of reality, but by the constructive creation of a nobler reality.

To put, affirmatively, into the hearts of men a truth which is inherently creative of new life, of eternal life, this is the unique function of the man of God.

And this is what religion's all about. This is the task of Christ's preacher. It is a constructive task. It is not the preacher's function to analyze life, much less to subtract from life. It is his function to carry life forward, to make it more abundant.

Let him enter his pulpit fresh from the contemplation of the truly big facts of life, with the moral glow and humbling of self-chastisement upon his soul and with the constructive purpose to open out the minds of his people toward God, to close in their flagging purposes and gird their souls for duty-doing, and he will speak that day the speech laden with the eternal.

Labor Unions and Violence

The McNamara case in Los Angeles, Calif., takes on the aspect of an important test case. In some ways, it is the most important happening in the labor world in a century. It has far reaching influences. Far better than a conviction in a court has been the confession of the McNamara brothers to the blowing up of the Times building in Los Angeles. If the men had been convicted, they would have been martyrs and the victims of a frame-up. As it is, no one can deny that the truth is known at last. The question of years is answered. Labor leaders have proved recreant to their trust and there is now precedent for believing that these leaders may sometimes incite and even execute illegal acts. Of course this is no more than might have been expected. The labor men are right in insisting that the betrayal of the cause by two men has no more bearing upon labor than the sin of two preachers would have upon the church. The only thing that gives it a larger significance is the necessity of explaining still other mysteries that the McNamaras could not possibly have been connected with in any way.

Danger of Prejudging Criminal Suits

The labor men have done no wrong in raising a defense fund in behalf of their union officials, provided it has been spent in legitimate channels, as it probably has been. Every man charged with crime is innocent until proven guilty. The McNamaras loudly protested their innocence. The point, however, where the labor men have made a tremendous tactical blunder has been in prejudging the case before the trial. They have been free with charges against the detective that was placed on the case by the government. They have charged a capitalistic combine with having "framed up" the case against the McNamaras. They have not been content with asking for a suspended judgment with reference to the labor leaders. They have pushed on to pronounce judgement against the men who did not see the case as they did. In the light of the present developments, they have placed themselves in an unfortunate light before the American people. The rash charges against everybody connected with the prosecution of the McNamaras has done more to undermine the public respect for labor leaders than has the defection of two men. The leadership of a great labor movement is a responsibility which calls for balance and fairness. It is permitted to any man to go as far as he will in his enthusiasm for toilers, but in the public mind it is not permitted that men in this enthusiasm should lose faith in other men. We shall never get far in the adjustment of our labor difficulties until on both sides there shall be a disposition to be fair and judicial. Labor leaders like Mr. Gompers are worse hurt by their off-hand ways of disposing of labor situations than by any alleged complicity with the McNamaras. We shall never know when Gompers first learned of the McNamaras' guilt but we do know his willingness to condemn men outside the labor movement without a trial.

A Housecleaning for Labor Leadership

No one can doubt that the great body of labor men in this country are honest. Probably the average of integrity among them would not be exceeded by any profession or business in the land. It is not the body of labor that is wrong, it is the leadership. The McNamara case will be the occasion of great good to labor by creating a demand for a thorough housecleaning in the organizations connected with the American Federation of Labor. Labor unions theoretically have a democratic form of government. We all know, however, that democracy furnishes ever the opportunity for the demagogue and the professional politician. It is not to be wondered at that laboring men who are unskilled in the arts of politics should fall the more ready victims of political methods. There are walking delegates whose days in the ranks of real labor have been few. There are leaders whose only claim to leadership is the fact that they know how to make a good speech in a company where speech-making is not an ordinary gift. There are of course great minded leaders like John Mitchell, who would be a credit to any government. But just as the political parties in many cities have fallen into the hands of Tammany organizations, or some other "inner circle" that is corrupt, so the labor men have been in more than one instance bought and sold in blocks. Labor unions are inevitable. The right of organization is too sacred to be denied to any group that has right purposes. But the right of organization carries with it the responsibility to order the affairs of the organization to the public good. The public is a party to every strike and suffers from every form of mal-adjustment between capital and labor. The average man is a sympathizer with unions. In this hour, however, when a definite proof of criminal leadership has been made, the friends of labor demand, as condition of their further friendship, a house-cleaning in the leader-ship. "Go after the man higher up."

The Weapons of Labor

The McNamara case furnishes further food for meditation upon the proper weapons of labor. The labor union movement necessarily faced war in securing its demands. Men of capital would not grant either proper hours, proper wages or proper conditions of labor by any mere polite request. It was the very first problem of union labor, and has remained a problem, what weapons were to be used in securing labor's demands. The strike was the first weapon. It has been used effectively in some cases. Against large corporations, however, it has not been an effective tool. The corporation will transport laborers from other communities or even from Europe to break up a strike. Or perhaps the large corporation will close its shop and starve the men into submission. Various other devices have been used of lesser power. When every other weapon has failed, the violent agitator begins to think of the method of the anarchist. The violent deeds of the laboring man have included the slugging of non-union men and the dynamiting of the property of corporations. These deeds of violence have been committed in many cases in all good conscience. They have been called "war." The socialistic contingent has through its street orators often encouraged such methods of warfare in this strife.

The McNamara case represents the breaking down of extreme methods. Labor will henceforth find its weapons in other quarters. The method will be arbitration. Even now the newspapers and public sentiment represent a kind of arbitration court that assigns defeat or victory to a given cause. When we grow more civilized, we shall have compulsory arbitration as they do in New Zealand. When this happy day comes, the warfare of labor will be conducted before a jury of disinterested citizens by rational arguments. Men will no longer be tempted to believe that killing 21 innocent citizens is war.

Unions Inevitable

It is certainly no time for any citizen to feel that unions are an evil to be abolished. Organization must be met with organization. Labor unions have improved human conditions immensely through their organization. The comparison of the lot of the steel operatives in Pittsburg who work seven days in the week with the workmen that are organized in other communities, shows that no corporation, no matter how benevolent the head may be in person—and where could you find a more benevolent head than the head of the steel trust?—may be trusted to do entire justice to its men. Unionism has reduced hours. It has improved conditions of labor. It has raised wages. It has furnished a means of helping destitute fellow-workmen. In many cases it has established a helpful apprentice system. Laborers have been educated in democracy in their efforts to unite in their common organization. They have grown in brotherhood as they have consciously related themselves to the rest of the industrial world. They have felt an increased dignity in labor. They have pooled their common knowledge in each craft and have come thereby to be far more skilled than the men who do not enjoy organization. These tremendous benefits are of such importance to society that with all the bad leadership of the union movement, we must all feel that it is by the road of something like our present unionism. we are to bring labor to the proper goal. There is a growing dignity in the union movement. Many unions that once met in saloons do so no more. The union movement was once mostly against the church. It is now experiencing a rapid change of front in this regard in the face of the friendliness of the churches. The movement will yet produce labor statesmen who will know how to mitigate the lot of laborers. Men will be delivered from the monotony of the highly specialized forms of industry. The greatly endowed men among the sons of toil will yet be the leaders.

Episcopal

Unity Not Mechanical But Dynamic.

The spiritual, evangelical conception of unity is fermenting in the thought of the Episcopal Church as well as among Disciples of Christ. The movement of these two bodies toward the realization of Christian unity will go forward along parallel lines. The dogma of the episcopate and the dogma of immersion-baptism stand in precisely the same position. Unity is impossible on the basis of these or any other dogmas. Not only is unity impossible, but the body that insists upon either dogma is rendered incapable of pleading for unity in such a spirit as to make the plea effective. An Episcopalian rector, writing in The Churchman, takes his brethren to task for their ungenerous spirit as follows:

As so-called Episcopalians we are ever boasting by word and manner that we are a lineal part of the Apostolic Church; that we enjoy an historic ecclesiastical prestige handed on unimpaired, that we are somehow the original givers of the great Authorized Version of the Bible; that we have preserved the primitive Faith, the primitive Orders, and the primitive Doctrine; that we are a Church household with peculiar prerogatives by reason of a kind of religious sanity and far-sightedness expressed through Anglo-Saxon Christianity, and yet, there are certain blemishes apparent which do not speak well for the "peace of Israel." Among them may be noted the "contemptuousness" and the "superiority" (to use Bishop Doane's own words) which some of the priests of the Church show in their ordinary intercourse with religious bodies around them. This does not make for unity. It strikes at the very heart of it. It is not in keeping with the religious spirit of the times, nor with apostolic principle or practice. Christ condemned it, and so did St. Paul. Besides, there are Church statesmen today, like the Bishop of the Philippines, the Bishop of Chicago and the Bishop of Montana, who, with real Christian humility, are willing to sacrifice some very dear and attractive Church pretensions, not principles, for a larger and deeper unity in the wide Church of God. Has this Vision taken hold of the soul of the Church? If it has not, it betrays a woeful lack of "foresight and hindsight" characteristic of the best religious thought of the times.

I take it that the idea of unity is often too superficial. It only spells uniformity. It should be dynamic, express with spiritual power the determination to win back the broken fragments of primitive Christian principle without betrayal of loyalty to that which binds us to "unseen realities." Can this be done by repudiating everything that is dear to the great religious bodies of Christendom, those bodies who are so fervent in their sincere desire to meet the personal and religious requirements of the Gospel of a Common Lord? I am convinced that Bishop Doane has a profound sense of that organic unity which occupies so large a place in the activities of the Church today, but I beg leave to take issue with him when he says that the "other Christian bodies" do not understand anything about the "priestly idea." They may not understand it in the way that we have been taught to understand it, but they certainly include it among those other aspects of the ministry which are fundamental. We may have the broader truth, the deeper, if you please, and the more historic, but the Christian priesthood presupposes, first of all, a vital belief in the saving power of Christ, and, without this saving belief, there can be nothing left but a formal, or mechanical, method which belongs to a dead system. While we may believe in the so-called "form of sound words" and enjoy a ceremony which has historicity for its watchword, we cannot, without stultifying the act and the motive, entirely repudiate those simpler methods which have brought comfort and light to the many thousands professing Christ outside "our Israel."

Episcopal General Convention.

Episcopal Church authorities in New York have just decided to erect, at a cost of $300,000, a hall that will accommodate the Episcopal General Convention meeting in that city in October, 1913, and afterward will be available for local use. The hall will contain auditorium seating 1,500, plenty of committee rooms, and a large dining room. The location will be on the Cathedral grounds, fronting on Amsterdam Avenue and the Cathedral Parkway.

There are two houses in the Episcopal General Convention. The House of Deputies, or larger body, will occupy the new hall, and the House of Bishops, with about one hundred in attendance, will sit in the old Synod Hall, which is eventually to be torn down to make way for the Cathedral's south transept, but is to be retained until after the fall of 1913. It was once an orphan asylum, and has been rebuilt for temporary use. The religious services of the Convention will take place in the Cathedral, of course.

The Cathedral is being made more and more a center for Episcopal agencies of the New York diocese. Archdeaconries have just been abolished, and in their places have been created general missionaries to be members of the Cathedral clergy staff. On the Cathedral grounds, besides the new Synod Hall, are soon to be erected a Cathedral Choir School, which draws its students from boys possessed of excellent voices wherever in the whole country they are found, and residences for bishop and dean. There is already on the ground, and in use, a School for Deaconesses, an institution of national scope. It is expected that work upon the new General Convention hall will be started at once.

Baptist

Do Baptists Excommunicate the Unimmersed?

It is very difficult nowadays for most Christian people to believe that there still exist professed Christians who regard as entirely outside of the church of Christ those who have not conformed to the outward physical act of immersion. But the Presbyterian Advance quotes a Baptist paper as giving the following explanation of the close communion still practiced by that body in the South: "The reason Baptists refuse to commune with Pedo-baptists is this: Pedo-baptists are not members of the church. They are good Christian men and women who ought to join the church." The Advance comments as follows:

It is seen that the writer admits that people who are not baptized by immersion may be good Christians, which is to admit that baptism is not essential to salvation, yet such unimmersed Christians are not fit to associate with at the table of the Redeemer of all Christians because they "are not members of the church."

The common view is that the church of Jesus Christ is made up of all true believers, but according to the Baptist view quoted above the church is not composed of believers but of persons who have been immersed. Immersion makes one fit for fellowship; regeneration does not. It is ridiculous logic by which such a writer seeks to maintain an untenable position. The only logical and reasonable position for such Baptists to assume is that immersion is essential to salvation. The only persons out of the church are those who are out of Christ. And what are these Baptist friends to do in the heavenly mansions? If the rest of us are Christians, they can hardly hope to put us out of heaven. Is it possible that they will still refuse to commune with their fellow Christians in the better world?

The Advance goes on to quote from The Christian Century a statement which, it says, affords a certain amount of comfort as showing that "not all Christians who believe immersion to be the proper form of baptism are in accord with this Baptist writer concerning the situation of the rest of us." The quotation is as follows:

"The Christian Century is not willing to conceive the membership of the church of Christ as limited only to those who have been immersed at their baptism. We joyfully acknowledge, not the Christian character only, but the Christian church membership also of Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists and the rest. They are just as truly members of the church of Christ as are the members of a Baptist church. Their churches are just as truly churches of Christ as are churches of the Disciples. If certain isolated passages of Scripture should seem to us to teach that these persons were not Christians and these churches not churches of Christ, we could more easily doubt our understanding, our exegesis, of the Scripture passages than we could bring our mind to disfranchise the great body of the existing churches."

Congregational

Full-Orbed Evangelism.

The effect of the Men and Religion Movement on the evangelistic ideals of the churches is already being felt. This full-orbed evangelism, which stresses both the individual and social aspects of Christianity represented in the team-work of such men as Fred B. Smith and W. E. Biederwolf on one hand and Charles Stelzle and Raymond Robins on the other, is not the least significant thing about the Men's Movement. The Congregationalist, reporting the Gipsy Smith meetings on the Pacific Coast, says:

Gipsy Smith has finished his evangelistic campaign at Spokane and Seattle, in Washington, and is now at Portland, Ore. He will go from Portland to Tacoma, thence to San Francisco and Los Angeles, giving three weeks to each place. The meetings in Seattle were marked by unity on the part of the churches, crowds and the generation of a splendid spiritual atmosphere. He made religion the topic of conversation. Those reached were nearly all church people—the members and children of the Sunday-school. The only jarring note was his attack upon Christian Science and Unitarianism, which brought out spirited replies in the press. It was evident to all that the "evangelistic note" is of great importance and must never be omitted from the program of the church. Thoughtful observers remarked, however, that it needed, even in so captivating an evangelist as Gipsy Smith, the crowning of the social application to life's activities. These observers are waiting with expectation for the Men and Religion Movement

The Spiritual Significance of Christmas

"The Word became flesh." The notion that the body is vile and that the religious person lives an attenuated existence in an ethereal region is inconsistent with belief in the incarnation. There was no hostility in the life of Jesus to material things. He warned men against a wrong use of them. Worldliness and spirituality are not distinguished by the use and non-use of the material world but the motives that control conduct. Money is used to buy votes and to defeat justice; it is also used to build hospitals and schools and to send missionaries of education and religion to the ignorant and degraded.

The sacredness of the body is emphasized in the teaching of Paul. It is the dwelling place of the Spirit of God. It ought therefore to be kept from defilement and made strong. It should be so disciplined that it will be on the side of our most exalted duties. To provide for it food and clothing and shelter is a good part of the work of us all. This work is a means of grace if we understand the relation between the world of sense and the world of thought and emotion. To mistreat the body is to deform the mind. The simplicity of truth incarnate is sung by Tennyson in these lines:

> "And so the Word had breath, and wrought
> With human hands the creed of creeds
> In loveliness of perfect deeds,
> More strong than all poetic thought;
> Which he may read who binds the sheaf,
> Or builds the house, or digs the grave,
> And those wild eyes that watch the wave

Ideas of human dignity and worth which wise men have grasped with difficulty and have stated in cloudy sentences are lodged in the minds of humble toilers and receive worthy expression in simple tasks. The themes of religion still engage the attention of the scholar and the philosopher and it is not likely that the most comprehensive and penetrating minds will ever cease to feel that the search for truth is just beginning; yet we can follow Christ with the assurance that we are getting the meaning we ought to get from our experience.

A spiritual service is the care, protection and guidance of childhood. A good woman, who had brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord her own children and after they were able to take care of themselves had taken a family of orphans and given them a mother's love, told a visiting minister that she had never been able to do any religious work. The visitor happened to know a little about religion and he promptly assured her that she had done more than the average woman in the service of the Master. It was unfortunate that some teacher of religion had not told her many years before that she was doing a splendid service. The Christmas exercises of the church should direct our minds toward the needs of all the children of the world and set us to work in behalf of those whose parents are unable to give them the care they need or who are ignorant or vicious and have no ideals for their children.

There is nothing honorable in a selfish life. It may be surrounded by all the externals of dignity and with ceremonies hoary with age; it remains loathsome and beastly. On the other hand, there is glory in deeds that bind men together in confidence and love. Lincoln once said he would be willing to hold the horse of a certain of his generals if the general would only win victories. This was in answer to the resentment of one who thought the general had shown the President scant courtesy. And had Lincoln held the horse, the world would have demanded that some great artist give it a painting of him in the act. The cross, which had been a symbol of shame and crime, was made the symbol of a conquering faith when it bore the body of him who came not to be ministered unto but to minister. The Christmas season is properly a time of joy. But its joys ought to be that of reasonable beings who never forget the serious side of life. The angels sang at the birth of the Savior and we ought to sing when we celebrate his birth. But our songs must not put us to sleep spiritually; they must be calls to duty as well as expressions of gratitude for benefits received. [Midweek Service, Dec. 20. John 1:14; Luke 2:1-7; Phil. 2:5-11.]

The Meaning of Baptism

XI.—JOHN THE BAPTIST.

We have been analyzing the ordinance of baptism as a social institution, to find what function, if any, it actually serves in the organization of religion. We found that the distinctive and essential characteristic of baptism is the induction of a penitent believer into the church; the conferment upon him of the Christian status, with its rights and obligations, by the social organism called in the New Testament the body of Christ.

It is our duty now to examine the passages of scripture which bear either directly or by implication upon the meaning of baptism, to see whether what we have called the sociological view checks up, so to speak, with scriptural usage. And naturally we take up first of all the New Testament narrative of the work of John the Baptist. Compared with all other baptism passages, the story of John is our classic source of information. Elsewhere only fragmentary allusions to the ordinance are found whose meaning is largely to be inferred from the context. But in the account of the Baptist we have a story in which baptism is the chief feature. And while, even here, the rite is referred to as though its significance were well known to the readers and its meaning is, therefore, not made explicit, nevertheless the whole enterprise of John is made so plain that we can hardly be left in doubt as to the place of baptism in his program.

John appeared upon the scene definitely as the founder of a new order. It was an order of penitent men, an order of righteousness. Into this order he bade men come. The proclamation of the fundamental principle and the specific duties of the new order was the burden of his preaching. He called men out, definitely, from the world and demanded that they stand with him in effecting specific works of righteousness. His message was directed to all, no less to the leaders of religion than to outcasts and Gentiles. He did not call men into any existing institution. He did not speak on behalf of the Jewish church or any religious order. He attacked the devotees of prevailing orthodoxy, and swept their cherished institutions away with a reformer's abandon. The times called for a new order, an order of repentance and right-doing. John came to establish such an order and his preaching called all men into it.

This character of John's work as definitely tending to constitute a new moral order in society is rarely considered. His use of the Old Testament passage to describe himself as a "voice" has been over-emphasized for rhetorical purposes by many interpreters. The individualistic aspect of his message and plan receives virtually the total attention of biblical students. The reason of this is probably the fact that John's movement as a social force never got past the stage of inchoate beginnings. It was hardly launched until it was eclipsed by the more significant enterprise of which Jesus of Nazareth was the leader. Nevertheless there can be no doubt that had not the Messiah appeared so soon the ideals and forces entering into the make-up of John's movement would have resulted in an organic religious community, if not a church.

As it was, we know that John attached certain disciples to himself who possessed a quasi-authority, distinguishing them from the multitude of his converts in precisely the same way that Jesus' twelve disciples were afterward distinguished from the larger company. And after the lapse of many years the book of Acts introduces us to certain men who claim discipleship to John and membership in his movement, not knowing as yet that his movement had been superseded by that of Jesus Christ. These facts would seem to indicate that John's work was of such a nature as to bind men together in a more or less defined social order.

But the chief fact that calls for a social interpretation of John's movement, as against the view that he concerned himself wholly with individuals, is his practice of the rite of baptism. We have already seen in our study of the origin and early practice of baptism that this was the ceremony by which proselytes were initiated into Judaism. As such a ceremony it was perfectly familiar to the people to whom John came. The fact that he is never prompted to offer an authoritative sanction for the ceremony proves that it was a well known and accepted custom. And the fact that he makes no explanation of any peculiar meaning which he attaches to it proves that he uses it with the accustomed meaning.

If it had been a new ceremony which John derived from heaven he would surely have given the people a divine sanction for it. There would have been questions and expressions of doubt from the people, and the prophet would have devoted much of his teaching to the establishing of his novel ordinance. But instead, both people and prophet seem to have been relatively unconscious of the ceremony as such and deeply concerned with the thing the ceremony signified. And assuming that it was not a novel but a customary ordinance, we are entirely at a loss to account for the authority with which John commanded men to submit to it, unless we also assume that he was calling men into a definite moral order. No great reformatory significance would have attached to his ministry had he preached repentance and immersion in water. Repentance was not novel. Immersion in water was not novel. There would have been no pertinency in Jesus asking the Pharisees on a later day the question concerning the baptism of John, "Was it from heaven or of men?" If repentance and immersion had been the burden of John's preaching they would have answered without hesitation, from heaven. But the significance of John's baptism had lain in the fact that he had commanded them to be baptized! He did not command them to be immersed—that could easily enough have been brought into their elaborate program of ceremonial washings. And as for the repentance which he enjoined, they could have gotten around that without embarrassment. But John commanded them to be baptized. He preached to them, the leaders of the Jewish church, the chosen people of God, that they must be initiated into a freemasonry of penitent men seeking righteousness, as a preparation for the coming of the Messiah and the Kingdom of God.

This was the heresy of John, and his distinction as a reformer: he excommunicated the church! He declared that the very leaders of religion were hugging a delusion. They said, We have Abraham for our father. The promises are to him and to his seed. We are the direct heirs of the promises. But John said, You are trusting in a fiction. God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham! No hereditary order will suffice. When Messiah comes he will see through your ecclesiastical pretensions. His flail is in his hand. He will thoroughly cleanse his floor. The wheat he will store in his barn and the chaff shall be burned with fire.

It is in John's attitude toward the representatives of religion that his essential significance stands out. He told them that they did not belong to the true church of God, and he commanded them humbly to bring forth appropriate fruits of repentance and join the true church of God! This was what his baptism meant. It was a baptism of repentance, an initiation into an order of penitent men. It was in his mind the beginning of a new order of Judaism, a spiritual order, whose fulfillment should come to pass at Messiah's appearing.

We can well understand the moral authority with which John spoke such a message as this. It is impossible to understand how he could command a specific physical act like immersion with moral authority. Why should any man be under obligation to heed such a command? Who is this wild stranger that presumes to tell us that we must be immersed at his hands? This is the way intelligent men would have met such an arbitrary mandate. But John is neither emphasizing an old ceremonial washing nor introducing a new rite—he is no partner of the Pharisees. He is the prophet of a new religious order, an order of righteousness, the vision of which he has caught somewhere in the wilderness. He calls men to the Jordan's banks that he may tell them of it and at once initiate as many as accept his message. It is his vision of a spiritual order that is the source of his moral imperativeness. It in his proclamation of a spiritual order that puts every hearer under moral obligation to accept his baptism.

John's use of the baptismal ceremony was both striking and revealing. It left no doubt in anybody's mind as to what the prophet's message meant. Baptism was the accepted rite of the initiation of a proselyte into Judaism. John's use of it, his insistence that all should submit to it, involved the invalidation of their present status before God. To ask the children of Abraham to be baptized meant that their blood-kinship to Abraham counted nought. It put them on precisely the same level as the proselytes whom they compassed sea and land to secure. It said to them, You are no better off before God than the proselytes! Let every man repent and be baptized into the new order of righteousness, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand!

It is no wonder this prophet was called the Baptist. He did not receive this title because he introduced baptism, nor because he preached the physical act of immersion as a divine command. He did neither. That John, the preacher of repentance and right doing as the only way of approach to God, should have become known to his contemporaries and to history as "the Baptist" is due to the fact that he preached the duty of the moral initiation, the baptism, of all men—pharisee, publican and Gentile—into the new order of righteousness the vision of which had been given him.

And because John laid the axe at the root of the tree of Judaism, and cut down every delusive pretension, and made a beginning at establishing a true religious order on the basis of righteous manhood, as over against privilege and heredity, Jesus himself bore this testimony of him that he was more than a prophet, that of all men born of women none had arisen greater than he.

But What Sayest Thou?

We have saved the soul of the man that killed,
  We have turned to shrive the thief;
We restored the pride of the man that lied
  And we gave him our belief;
But for her that fell we have fashioned hell
  With a faith all stern and just—
It was so of old; and no man has told
  What our Lord wrote in the dust.

We have sighed betimes of our brothers' crimes
  And have bade them be of cheer,
For the flesh is weak, and the soul grown meek
  May yet read its title clear.
But we draw away from the one astray
  As the truly righteous must.
She is cursed, indeed!—and we did not read
  What our Lord wrote in the dust.

For the men who thieved, and who killed, and lied—
  Who have slain the woman's soul—
We have worked and prayed, and have seen them made
  All clean and all pure and all whole.
But we drive her out with a righteous shout
  In our Pharisaic trust.
So the man goes free—but we did not see
  What our Lord wrote in the dust.

So long as character hovers between competing ends, computing the consequences of pleasure and of pain, balancing the expediency of self-interest and of self-sacrifice, its spiritual momentum slackens. It is like a vessel that hangs in the wind until her steerageway is lost. Movement involves decision, as a vessel obeys its wheel. To seek righteousness first is to have other things added; to seek other things first is to find that the more they are gained, the more of life they subtract.—Francis Greenwood Peabody.

No character is made, whether it be good or bad, but by a slow building up: no man becomes most wicked all at once, and no man is sanctified by a wish or at a jump. As long as men are in a world so abounding with temptation, "he that is washed" will need daily to "wash his feet" that have been stained in the foul ways of life, if he is to be "clean every whit."—Alexander Maclaren.

The World's Perfect Love Story

"The Brownings: Their Life and Art."

REVIEWED BY FRANCES KINGDON.

Once in a while there comes from the publishers a book so beautiful and full of treasures that the reader wants to take it away to some quiet, lovely corner and there simply hold it close to the heart before beginning to turn the pages which are to give so much joy. Such a book has come this season from the Boston firm of Little, Brown & Co., and it is the story of "The Browings; Their Life and Art," by Lilian Whiting, who must have written it with a tear in her eye and a bird singing in her heart. To write of the life of Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning whose romance, one of the most beautiful the world has known, is the pleasant, sacred task that Miss Whiting has completed so well that literature is the richer and finer for her record.

Picturesque Surroundings.

"It is difficult to realize," says Miss Whiting, on the first page of her book, "that this immortal idyll of poetry, genius and love, this story which has touched the entire world "with mystic gleams, like fragments of forgotten dreams," was less than fifteen years in duration, out of his seventy-seven and her fifty-five years of life. The destiny of the Brownings led them into constantly picturesque surroundings; and the force and manliness of his nature, the tender sweetness and playful loveliness of hers, combined with their vast intellectual range, their mutual genius for friendship, their devotion to each other and to their son, their reverence for art, and their lofty and noble spirituality of nature, all united to produce this exquisite and unrivaled romance of life—'A Beauty passing the Earth's store.'

Childhood of the Poets.

"In their childhood each of these two beloved poets lived in an atmosphere of rare culture and fortunate influences and early were stimulated and encouraged to warm their hands at the divine fire. With Browning there was never any question about his definite vocation as a poet. The first book of his own purchase was a copy of Ossian's poems and his first poem, 'Pauline,' published before his twenty-first birthday, had the same conceptions of life as those more clearly and fully presented in 'Paracelsus' and 'Sordello.' Little Elizabeth Barrett was also born to love books and dreams, and assimilated learning as naturally as she played with her dolls. She was no prodigy, but an eager, earnest little maid, who, although she read Homer before she was eight years old, yet read him with her doll clasped close in one hand, and who wrote her childish rhymes as unconsciously as a bird sings. When she was fifteen years old a fall from her saddle when trying to mount her pony caused a life-long delicacy of health. In spite of legendary traditions that she was a nervous invalid, Elizabeth Barrett was 'full of intensest life.' 'I have had enough,' she once wrote to Mr. Browning, 'to tame me, and might be expected to stand still in my stal., but you see I do not. Headlong I was at first and headlong I continue, precipitately rushing forward through all manner of nettles and s, instead of keeping the path; guessing at the meaning of unknown words instead of looking in the dictionary, tearing up letters and never untying a string—and expecting everything to be done in a minute and the thunder to be as quick as the lightning.'

First Meeting of the Poets.

"It was on a beautiful May afternoon that at last, after some inspiring and tenderly appreciative correspondence, Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett first met, and of them it could almost have been said, in words ascribed to Michael Angelo for Vittoria Colonna,—

'We are the only two, that face to face,
Do know each other, as God doth know us both.'"

In the years which had preceded this meeting the poets had become famous. Miss Barrett had "heard the nations praising her far off," but the verdict did not affect her own high standard. "I have written these poems," she says, "as well as I could, and I hope to write others better. I have not reached my own ideal . . . but I love poetry more than I love my own success in it."

King of the Mystics.

"Robert Browning was even then 'king of the mystics,' and had given to the world Pippa Passes, A Blot in the 'Scutcheon, etc."

Owing to the strange attitude of Miss Barrett's father in forbidding any of his children to marry, and her own delicate health, she felt at first that she could not accept the great trust of his happiness. But in a few months she confesses to him that she is his "for everything but to do you harm, and none except God and your own will shall interpose between you and me." And he answers, "When I come back from seeing you and think over it all, there is never a least word of yours I could not occupy myself with."

It was in September that the two poets were wedded, clandestinely, with only two servants as witnesses, but says Miss Whiting, "in no act of Mrs. Browning's life did she more impressively reveal her good sense than in this of her marriage. 'I had long believed such an act,' she said, 'the most personal of my life, to be within the rights of every person of mature age, and I had resolved to exercise that right in my own case by a resolution that had slowly ripened. All the other doors of life were shut to me, and only before this door stood one whom I loved best and who loved me best, and who invited me out through it for the good's sake he thought I could do him!'"

Removal to Italy.

After their marriage the Brownings went to Italy to live. In Pisa and Florence they lived, loved and wrote. In Florence their little son was born and they "caught up" their parental duties with a sort of rapture. Mr. Browning would walk the terraces where orange trees and oleanders blossomed, with the baby in his arms. It was there one morning after their breakfast that Mrs. Browning, with shy sweetness, tucked the pages of the "Sonnets" into her husband's pocket and swiftly vanished. It is in these she answers his question—

"How do I love thee? Let me count the ways.
I love thee to the depth and breadth and height
My soul can reach . . .
I love thee with the breath,
Smiles, tears of all my life!
And if God choose,
I shall but love thee better after death."

The wonderful friendships that so enriched the lives of the poets could fill a volume alone. The Marchese and Marchesa d' O'ssoli (Margaret Fuller) and their child spent their last evening in Italy with them and even then expressed a fear of the voyage that after its fatal termination was recalled as being almost prophetic. At the christening ceremony of Tennyson's little son Browning took the baby in his arms and tossed him up and down, although his own little son "disgraced us all by refusing to kiss the baby." Florence Nightingale was another visitor to the Brownings when they visited England, and always followed her calls by a gift of masses of flowers. Charles Kingsley impressed them with his genial and tender kindness, and while they thought some of his social views rather wild and theoretical, they loved his earnestness and originality. Mrs. Carlyle, Mrs. Browning found, "full of thought, and feeling and character." Hans Christian Anderson, Fanny Kemble, Thackeray's daughter, now Lady Ritchie, Harriet Hosmer, Goethe's grandson, Adelaide Proctor, Bayard Taylor, Kate Field, the Hawthornes and many other of the world's illustrious, met the Brownings again and again and shared with them their love of beauty and poetry.

Last Days.

During the closing days of Mrs. Browning's stay on earth, her constant aim was to "keep quiet and try not to give cause for trouble on my account, to be patient and live on God's daily bread from day to day." At the close, for a few hours before she died, she talked with her husband, passing into a state of ecstacy, expressing to him in ardent and tender words her love and happiness. With the glow of a bright Florentine dawn entering her room and with the words, "It is beautiful," she passed away. Browning was too great a spirit to sink into a recluse, and afterward in London, in Rosetti's studio, he soon met Millais and by degrees he responded to friends and the many voices of life. He seemed to think there was something morbid and unworthy in the avoidance of the world of men and women and no revelation of human nature could come amiss to him. It was not until twenty-eight years later, when the world had again and again given him new honors and greater fame and homage, that the reunion he had anticipated in these lines came:

"Then a light, then to my breast,
O thou soul of my soul, I shall clasp thee again
And with God be the rest."

Robert and Elizabeth Browning would have been great as man and woman, if they had not been great poets. They lived for something higher than mere personal ends and their aim may well be read in the lines of "Aurora Leigh,"

"Beloved, let us love so well,
Our work shall be better for our love,
And still our love be sweeter for our work,
And both commended. for the sake of each,
By all true workers and true lovers born."

The Beauty of Duty

The longer on earth we live,
And weigh the various qualities of men,
The more we feel the high, stern-featured beauty
Of plain devotedness to duty;
Steadfast and still, nor paid by mortal praise,

Surveying a City's Church Life

An Examination of Religious Conditions in Springfield, Illinois

BY H. T. MORRISON, M. D.

EDITORS' NOTE: Next to faith the facts are the most important matters in religious work. There is no sacrilege in making an inventory of the Christian resources in a given community. On the contrary the church has been handicapped for the lack of just this kind of definite information. Each denomination in the community knows the facts as to its own progress and present strength, but the church as a whole has no machinery for gathering the data by which to determine whether its cause is gaining or waning. The united ministers' association of Springfield, Ill., requested Dr. H. T. Morrison, a layman, but deeply interested in Christian work, to make a Survey of church conditions in the city. With great pains he has wrought at the task for many weeks, finally completed it and presented its results before the association on a recent Monday. We have made an abstract of this Survey which we set before our readers as a suggestion of the method by which a similar service may be rendered in any city. We have selected these particular facts from Dr. Morrison's voluminous array in order to make a background for his examination of the results of the W. A. Sunday revival held in Springfield two and a half years ago. The section of his Survey dealing with this revival we regard as the most incisive and illuminating study of present day revivalism which has ever come under our observation. It will be published in The Christian Century next week.

In obtaining the facts presented in this survey, a questionaire was sent to thirty-three protestant evangelical pastors. These were returned with a few exceptions as completely filled out as possible. Where a report of an individual church was not granted by the minister addressed, it was obtained from the records through the courtesy of a reliable member of the congregation. So that the Survey included thirty-one churches—five Presbyterian, three Baptist, one United Brethren, five Methodist Episcopal, four Episcopal, two Congregational, three Lutheran, three Disciple, and five colored churches. The last named are not included in the general statistics, except where expressly indicated. I want, however, in this connection, to express my gratefulness to the colored ministers for the very modest statements made in their replies. In every instance, I am of the opinion, the statistics given were well within the limit of reality.

There is no intention to make the figures obtained a basis of comparison between preachers and congregations. I have a strong aversion to merely mathematical estimates in religion. The church's glory is not in its numbers. The Lord is not saving the world by mathematical demonstration. The kingdom of Heaven is not composed of congregations numbering one thousand people. The kingdom of Heaven is a spiritual entity, and the church is the instrument for realizing it. We cannot always safely estimate spiritual values by numbers. God pity the preacher who disregards this fact and concludes his ministry a failure without the crowd!

ORGANIZATION AND BUILDINGS.

Springfield contains a population of fifty thousand souls ministered to by not less than forty-eight religious organizations, Catholic and Protestant, in addition to the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. Of these communions, forty-three have edifices in which their services are held. There are thirty-three protestant evangelical congregations.

The protestant edifices have a combined seating capacity of fifteen thousand four hundred, while the Catholic edifices have estimated sittings for from forty-five hundred to five thousand persons. The total sittings are, therefore, approximately twenty thousand.

CHURCH ATTENDANCE.

Every pastor was requested to record an actual count of men and women in his congregation for three Sundays. Every one of these days was an example of perfect fall weather, with a single exception on the evening of the third Sunday, when a heavy rain was falling. In the summarized figures herewith presented this evening's count was omitted, and the averages based on the two preceding evenings solely.

Lest there might be some who would give merely an estimate and not an actual count, I took the pains to either make the count myself or have it made by a reliable individual. As anticipated, some gave only estimates, and in all such cases the estimates were high. One pastor reported his morning congregation as numbering one hundred seventy-five, when there were only ninety-seven present; another recorded five hundred fifty, when the actual count showed three hundred seventy-six; and still another reported two hundred fifty, when he was preaching to just one hundred fifty-five. These had overestimated their congregations by thirty-one, fifty-five and sixty-two per cent.

Seating Capacity Exaggerated.

Another pastor recording the seating capacity of the edifice added practically one hundred per cent for good measure.

In advising of the sittings of their buildings, it was noteworthy the approach most pastors made to the facts. In most cities, I am of the opinion, the figures would be much above the actual capacity. Here the preachers showed an ability to count and record the sittings far beyond the average of those educated in theological seminaries. Some, however, showed the effect of a thorough seminary course. To these it would be a surprise to have a couple of high school boys count the congregation on some occassion when the seats were entirely filled, and from this count be apprised of the number in attendance. One example will suffice. The sittings in one church were recorded as 700, when 400 is an extreme limit of the building's capacity.

FINANCES.

Church finances is a continuously interesting subject. Books and magazine articles are written, preachers spend wakeful hours brewing plans, and church treasurers and ladies' aid society officials are on the job constantly to finance the organization without deficit. I have no solution for the problem. Some present today have and doubtless we shall hear from them. It was thought interest would attach to the figures connected with the monetary side of the church's life.

Including the colored churches, the protestant evangelical churches own property aggregating in value $1,125,500, with an indebtedness on the same and unprovided for of $83,240.

Assets, it will be observed, are well above liabilities, so no danger of insolvency on the material side is approaching.

Pastors' Salaries.

We pay our pastors an average annual salary, not including the colored churches, of $1,678. This does not mean that every pastor receives this amount of money, for some receive a pitifully small amount for the labor and efficiency required of them. It represents, however, a living wage, which the ministry is not always paid. Compared with the public school men of the city, it is more than $200 higher, their annual average being $1,467.

For its own current expense budget the churches raise and expend annually $83,637. This is merely for maintenance, such as salaries, heat, light, fuel, and all other local expenses.

MISSIONS AND BENEVOLENCE.

In support of missions and benevolence there is each year $25,580 contributed. Of this $7,623 is for Foreign Missions and $17,957 for Home Missions and benevolences, or less than thirty per cent for Foreign and more than seventy per cent for Home Missionaries and benevolence. According to these figures, we contribute not quite one third as much for missions and benevolence as for the support of our own local church. Slightly less than one third of the total missionary and benevolence offerings goes to heathen countries.

For musicians in the churches, we pay $8,215—more than our total contribution for foreign missions.

Of all the regular money raised and expended, there is a grand total of $109, 217. This represents a per capita offering, based on the active membership of the churches, of $13.15. The figures are an eloquent testimonial to tne real spirit of the real membership of our churches.

OVERLAPPING.

Within a radius of four blocks in the down-town district, we have eleven churches, requiring an equal number of preachers. In that district, six blocks long and five blocks wide, we expend annually approximately fifty thousand dollars for the maintenance of the churches alone. The entire company of people worshiping in these churches on Sunday morning could be ministered to by five preachers, and their congregations would average only four hundred and sixty-five, and the combined evening congregations of the eleven churches, if divided among five preachers, would make a congregation of only two hundred and seventy for each minister. The combined number on a good evening recently was only one thousand three hundred and forty-nine. With five instead of eleven churches, we could save in current expenses, annually, more than twenty-six thousand dollars, and would have property from our present holding amounting to six hundred twenty-two thousand six hundred dollars to establish churches and other needed institutions in unchurched localities.

Waste of Funds.

Our interest in the unsaved and in the mission fields at home and abroad may well be questioned when we are so profligate in the use of funds and men as to plant our churches thickly in one region and let the great masses go unchurched and unevangelized. Within a radius of four blocks down-town we have eleven churches, while Harvard Park with a population of one thousand people has nothing but a mission with preaching once a month on Sunday afternoon, and Ridgely, a field as needy as any in the city and with a population of fifteen hundred, has no church at all.

It may be insisted that the down-town church is for Harvard Park and Ridgely, and this is true. But the down-town church will never save Harvard Park or Ridgely. By locating our churches far away, we are making attendance and worship there prohibitive for many who are not provided with conveyance nor sufficient means to afford transportation on the street car. More than this, the more capable and active members of the community who are qualified to add to the religious life of their locality and furnish religious leadership necessary for their neighborhood, are being drawn to a distant community where the church is located, so that the locality which has the rightful claim upon their talent and energy suffers from the removal of their religious activities to remote parts.

Church and Community Life.

More serious yet than these facts is it that that church cannot be an expression of the particular community's social life where these far removed persons live, and therefore fails in one of the essential characteristics of a successful church. A church situated down-town will never be of much value to people living in Ridgely, even should they have the means to attend. It can never grip and influence them in any great degree, except it connects up with their social life and becomes in some measure an expression of it. A resident of Springfield might almost as well be expected to hold church membership in Buffalo [a neighboring town] as for a citizen living in Harvard Park to expect great profit and satisfaction from membership in a down-town church. The slight difference in difficulty met by these two citizens in reaching their respective churches is not the point at issue. It is the fact that the Buffalo church is not, and cannot possibly be, an expression of the community and social life of the Springfield citizen, and will not therefore be of great advantage to him as a church. The church that really ministers must do so with a recognition of social peculiarities and life.

Remedy Lies in General Sentiment.

Now I am not dwelling upon this fault because there is possible the application of an immediately remedial agency. It will not be remedied for some time to come. Nor will it be accomplished by a single congregation or denomination determining to cure the unwholesome condition. Only by the power of united sentiment for division of territory will the church be made equally accessible to the residents of all districts.

Notwithstanding what I conceive to be a grievous fault in the overlapping of churches in certain parts of the city, I am very glad to testify to the fine fellowship and fraternity existing among the preachers and congregations throughout the entire city. Proselytism is reduced to the minimum by Christian comity. Churches give letters to each other where occasion warrants and in most cases the letters are received, and pastors consult more or less freely prior to the transfer of membership from one denomination to another.

MEMBERSHIP AND ACTIVITIES.

The total enrollment of the churches is 11,961. Of this company the active membership numbers 8,278, and the backsliders 3,683 Thirty per cent, almost one-third of the total enrolled membership of the churches, are backsliders. They have no vital touch with the church that warrants the pastor to count them among his helpers, or even among those who are recipients of the church's spiritual values. Their only connection is their name printed in the directory from year to year. One of the pastors suggested in the questionaire the subject of "Church Discipline," as appropriate for the consideration of this Survey. It is to be regretted that time is not sufficient for treatment of a theme so manifestly appropriate and suggestive!

Church Members at Church.

Of the entire enrolled membership, according to the figures obtained on three successive Sundays, thirty-seven per cent will be found at least once in attendance at the service of worship. Of the active membership, fifty-four per cent are present. For these percentages ten per cent was deducted from the morning congregation for non-members and children, and thirty per cent from the evening attendance for non members, children and those already enumerated in the morning congregation.

The average number of men attending church, counting both services on these three Sundays was 2,536, and the women numbered 3,813. The proportion of men was forty per cent and women sixty per cent—not a bad relative showing for the masculine element of the community. The figures suggest that if the data were on hand showing the relative proportion of men and women enrolled in the churches, it would be disclosed that the male members average as well or even higher in church attendance than the women.

Prayer Meetings.

The mid-week Prayer-meeting is attended by a company of people more religious than numerous. Only eleven per cent of the active membership of the church may be found there each week. Combined in one, all the prayer services would gather together 718—not a conspicuous multitude but numerically far stronger than Gideon's band.

The Sunday-school has no rival among the church's organizations, yet only twelve per cent of the enrolled and twenty-three per cent of the active membership of the church attend it. Out of an enrollment in the Sunday-schools of 5,576, about 3,633 children and adults study the Bible every fair Sunday morning.

No Salaried Sunday-School Workers.

No Sunday-school reported a salaried worker. No ungenerous word or thought should be allowed against the sacrificing and faithful men and women who uphold and carry forward the teaching function of the church. But it is to be hoped that some day a more just consideration will be found for this most vital part of our organized religious duty, and that, even at cost of money, the most capable teachers and workers, with special equipment, shall be set to the task of leading the child to God.

Perhaps, too, some day we shall discover instead of the great emotional revival there is a more substantial way for the church to grow. By our present evangelism we are not receiving as many converts into the church as should naturally come from the Sunday-school. There are churches that every year receive into their membership boys and girls just entering the adolescent period—the time of life most susceptible to the Gospel's appeal. These churches keep constantly before the child church membership and discipleship as the objective of the Sunday-school. So that when about the age of fourteen has been attained, he comes naturally, and without stirring emotional appeals, to accept the vows of a Christian. From the data of such churches in our own city, it is learned that for every 100 enrolled in Sunday-school there is annually an average of twelve children coming to the church membership age. So that the school of 300 enrollment, if the average is maintained, would have each year thirty-six becoming old enough for reception into the church.

Revivalism and Children.

In many churches these children are left for the moving power of an exciting revival campaign to sweep them into the church. Sometimes the revival avails and very often it does not. The data received from my questionaire reveals the fact that those churches, being recruited from the Sunday-schools, and depending solely on the teaching function to bring children to decision for Christ, are having proportionately more conversions annually than the churches relying on the revivalistic upheaval for their growth. This will be surprising to some. It was to me. The questionaire shows that those churches resorting to revivalism as a recruiting method had three converts last year for every one hundred of their membership, while the churches practicing confirmation had six converts per one hundred members, or exactly one hundred per cent more.

One Pupil in Eight.

We have said that one out of every eight enrolled in our Sunday-schools, according to statistics given, becomes of church membership age annually. To be very conservative let us say that one out of fourteen reaches this age annually. The combined enrollment of our schools last year was 5,576. This means that there should have been naturally expected from the Sunday-schools alone, four hundred conversions. As a matter of fact, we had from all sources a total of only 332 conversions during the year—sixty-eight less than should have been received normally from the Sunday-school ranks alone. If our high pressure revivalism succeeds in occasionally converting a hardened sinner, there is also apparent, as a result of our present system, a loss to the church of many of those children upon whom the claims of discipleship should most easily and normally be made. And who shall decide between the relative value to the kingdom of the converted sinner and the clean young life enlisted in the natural growth of its experience?

RELATIVE EFFICIENCY OF LARGE AND SMALL CHURCHES.

Is the balance for efficiency found on the side of the large or the small church? Arbitrarily, the churches were divided for comparison into two groups—those having a membership of less than 500 forming one, and those numbering more than 500 another. The only actual basis possessed for comparison is statistics. As to the absolute spiritual excellence of either, we may hardly judge. Only the data will be given and interpretation may be made by the individual hearer.

The Social Views of Alexander Campbell

As Disclosed in His Debate with Robert Owen.

BY J. R. PERKINS.

It is not at all surprising that Alexander Campbell, metaphysician and theologian, and Robert Owen, patriarch of utopian socialism, were utterly incomprehensible to each other in their celebrated debate held in Cincinnati, April, 1829. That debate is valuable to the student today chiefly on its social side. But it is indeed regrettable that the theological rather than the social receives the greater attention. This is due to the fact that Mr. Campbell, far superior as a debater to Mr. Owen, brought to bear all the wealth of his erudition to the exposition of the theological side of the controversy; though it purported to be "a debate on the evidences of Christianity, containing an examination of the Social System, and all the systems of scepticism of ancient and modern times."

Traveled in Parallel Lines.

At the outset of the debate these two separated and traveled, not in opposite directions, but in parallel lines. Mr. Campbell, with his individualistic conception of Christianity, and Mr. Owen, without any clear notion of historic Christianity, held but little in common. It is not a question as to which "got the better" of the other; and the student who searches for this element in this debate misses the mark. Metaphysically and theologically, Mr. Owen did not attempt to answer Mr. Campbell. He could not. Socially and economically Mr. Campbell did not attempt to reply to this leader in utopian socialism. He could not. So it is idle for any to contend that the theologian crushed the socialist in the controversy.

It was easy for Mr. Campbell to demonstrate the fallacy of Mr. Owen's schemes for the amelioration of the ills of society. In fact, they were then demonstrating their own illusory character. In 1827, two years before the debate, the New Harmony experiment had come to naught, and to this the theologian pointed as argument and proof of the error in the socialist's theories. But nowhere did Mr. Campbell attempt to expound the fallacy of Mr. Owen's social principles, because the theologian did not understand them. And right here do we enter upon the crux in the whole matter.

Lacked Economic Interpretation.

Mr. Campbell seems to have had no grasp of the philosophy of history from its economic side. It would have been remarkable if he did have such grasp in the year 1829. For this interpretation of history was not fully formulated until 1847, nearly twenty years later, and then by one, Karl Marx, who had given a lifetime to its study. It is to be regretted by every lover of social evolution that Alexander Campbell did not meet Karl Marx in debate about 1847 instead of the fanciful Owen in 1829. If so, doubtless there would have been a better understanding among the fathers of the Restoration movement as to the place of the social teaching of Jesus in their theology.

Mr. Campbell labored under another difficulty. Robert Owen was not able to present with clarity the principles of communism, out of which our modern socialism has come. Like Saint-Simon and Fourier, he often lost sight of scientific socialism in his passionate desire to see it speedily at work. And when Mr. Campbell deals with the social subjects at all in this debate he, too, is looking at the Utopia and not at the Philosophy. For instance, when the question of property came up, Mr. Owen was utterly unable to make clear to the theologian that Socialism did not mean the abolition of property, but of bourgeois property just as bourgeois property had abolished feudal property. Had he been able to point out that social property is the aim of Socialism, and is but a natural step in the evolution of the race towards real Democracy, there is no reason to doubt that Mr. Campbell would have both understood and appreciated. But all this was but hazy at that time, and Marx and Engles were but boys.

Theological Retort.

It is indeed singular to note how Mr. Campbell gave a theological retort to all Mr. Owen's social propositions. The method reveals the mind of the great theologian. There is not the slightest doubt but that he was grounded in the old belief that the social system was God-given. He certainly held that God gave a social system to the Jews. The system is not to be changed necessarily, but men are to be changed within the system. He comprehends here the present school of extreme individualists who are making stout resistance against the encroachments of social interpretations. Apropos of one of Owen's social propositions, Mr. Campbell says, "It is surely a novel species of logic to argue that because we shall have better houses, schools, and must have new bridges, etc., therefore the Christian religion must be false."

Conception of Socialism.

Mr. Campbell understood the Socialist to be arguing wholly for a condition in society whereby man, like an over-fed ox, might lie down at ease and doze. No doubt Mr. Owen was cloudy in his statements as to a society in which there would be plenty. But it is rather remarkable that Mr. Campbell seems to have no conception at all as to what the socialist was driving at. Remarkable, because the generation was rife with such discussion. Can it be that Mr. Campbell was absolutely unaware of the significance of social movements in Europe? Or, does he hold that the union of the churches would remove the ills in society? Have we thus stumbled on to a theological cure for a social disease? There is but little doubt that Mr. Campbell held that the catholicon for all the vexing things in the social order was a united church. And a united church, still in a hard and unjust system, would, to Mr. Owen, but accentuate the farce. So there you are!

Socialism and French Revolution.

It is difficult for us today to understand just how Mr. Campbell confused the utopian socialism of Robert Owen with the evils of the French Revolution. The "spectre haunting Europe," just as the Revolution had been, was but the daring of unbelievers; was but the darkness of atheism to Alexander Campbell. He does not seem to have had grasp of the fact that the institutions within a system are necessarily destroyed, or altered, with the destruction or the alteration of that system. Thus, if the church in France is having a difficult time to adjust itself in the new order is it not proof that the new order is atheistical? The theologian all but asks that question to the amazed socialist. Had Mr. Campbell seen that the struggle in France was one between proletarian and bourgeoisie, in which theist and atheist were but incidental, if even that, he would have arrived at one of the most significant facts in the history of the race. It is the fault of the church if the church in such a struggle is caught on the wrong side.

One Point of Agreement.

Only once in debating the "Social System" does Mr. Campbell approach Mr. Owen. What a pity they could not have paused right there, discarded all metaphysical and theological argument, and in the light of historic Christianity and social evolution worked out a common philosophy. It was when the theologian touched on the communism of the church in the first century. In the light of the things looming largest on our social and religious horizon today, this statement from this great leader is by far the most significant of any. We may not twist it from its context, giving to it an ecclesiastical bent which he surely never intended. He said:

"There was a society in the New Testament times which had all things in common; but their happiness was not derived from a community of goods, but from that principle which issued, in their circumstances, in a community of goods. I most sanguinely anticipate a restoration of the ancient order of things, and a state of society far superior to anything yet exhibited on earth. . . And that some of the views of Mr. Owen may then be realized as the legitimate fruits of Christianity, I would not deny."

Campbell's Contribution.

This sentence is Alexander Campbell's contribution to what we love to term, Christian socialism. It came in a burst of oratory when he was admitting that, "Some truth (referring to Owen) may be learned from an opponent." It matters not that the happiness of those early disciples practicing communism came rather out of their expectation that Jesus would soon come again and perhaps transplant them to glory. Mr. Campbell's error here, if error it be, is wholly incidental. He accepts the fact of communism in the early church and, "anticipates a restoration of the ancient order." His may have been altogether an ecclesiastical program with no thought of an economic one. But an economic one, finally evolved and made clear by Marx and Engles, could not have failed to have appealed to the logical mind of the great theologian. His confusion of social problems and their cure was but the confusion of his times.

Alameda, Calif.

The wonderful Gary steel plant at Gary, Ind., is producing more steel than ever before in its history. There is activity in all departments, 6,500 men being on the steel works pay roll alone. The sixty inch universal plate mill has been placed in operation for the first time and wheels are turning once more in the axle mill, where many large orders have been received. The rail mill, merchant mill, five billet mills, six blast furnaces, twenty-two open hearth furnaces, and 360 coke ovens are in active commission. The Gary plant of the American Bridge company is working night and day.

Special Services for Christmas and New Year

By William E. Barton.

The year 1911 goes out on Sunday, and that fact affords some special opportunity for services on Christmas eve and also on the last night of the year.

A suitable Christmas eve service can be made round some of the old Christmas carols. People like to sing at Christmas time, and some of our very best hymns relate to the Christmas festival. Choirs do their best then, and the hearts of the people are in accord. We need our best music at Christmas time.

The sermons are not easy. Has not every possible aspect of the Christmas story been preached upon a thousand times? And not only the preachers but the poets and the musicians and the painters have gone over and over and over the story to find some theme associated with Christmas which they could give a new emphasis. But the heart makes its own discoveries of the meanings of Christmas, and every scribe instructed into the Word of God brings forth out of his treasures things new and old.

People Like Pictures.

People like pictures at Christmas time. A Sunday evening of stereopticon pictures of the life of Christ is very appropriate then. There are some new series on the life of Christ, particularly one by William Hole of Edinburgh. There are eighty beautiful colored pictures made in Palestine. The pictures from the Chapel of the Ascension in London, that wonderful church where no sermons are ever preached except through pictures, are now available. There are some fine new Madonnas from Munich and Holland and Italy. The story of mother love in art affords a fitting theme.

Effective New Year's Service.

A Sunday New Year's eve service can be made particularly effective. The time from 8 o'clock till midnight affords opportunity for a cumulative service of great power. It is astonishing how fast the time goes.

Suppose you plan it thus:

8-9:30. Regular evening service, with sermon appropriate for the closing year.

9:30-10:30. Messages from other pastors.

10:30-11. Intermission with light refreshments.

11-12. Prayer meeting.

That would be a very simple outline, and would take up the whole time very profitably.

I rather favor a half hour's intermission, as four hours is a long time to keep a service going. However, I have twice carried through such a service without any intermission, and it did not seem wearisome.

Keep Choir Through.

If you can arrange to keep your choir through and in good form, a musical service from 10:30 to 11:30 will prove an interesting feature, and will hold your congregation to the end. The choir, assisted perhaps by other choirs of the town, may prepare a cantata to last an hour, beginning just after the intermission.

If the other churches are holding their regular evening services, they can come into such a service as this and help it to its cumulation. Three different choirs and ministers can take an hour each for music and message.

Such a service might be planned thus:

8-9. Our own minister and choir.

9-9:40. A neighboring minister and choir.

9:40-10:30. Another minister and choir.

10:30-11. Intermission.

11-12. Prayer meeting.

Or if the musical service were to form the chief attraction, that could come from 10:30 to 11:30 and the prayer meeting follow.

Make Last Hour Impressive.

The last half hour or hour can be made very impressive if the hearts of the people are prepared for it. There should be brief and earnest testimonies, many prayers and some singing.

The pastor should take the last ten minutes for a simple, earnest word, closing with prayer.

It adds to the impressiveness if the prayer closes exactly at midnight, and the church bell tolls twelve strokes between the prayer and benediction. For this exact adjustment it may be well to have an electric signal connecting the pulpit with the belfry, the minister pressing the button at the precise moment when the bell should be rung. In some churches the belfry is so situated that this is not necessary, but it is a very simple thing to arrange and adds to the impressiveness of the close of the service.

Young Men and the Churches

By H. D. Jenkins.

We are heartily in sympathy with every effort to win men for Christ, but the representations made by some of our Brotherhood orators are open to criticism. It is not true that "men are deserting the churches," nor is it true, as the editor of a very widely-read, popular periodical has recently affirmed, that "young men do not go to church simply because they find nothing there worth while."

According to the census bureau, charged with enumeration and tabulation of our population, there are now in the United States proper, excluding our islands, 88,043,455 citizens. Of these, according to the same authorities, "there are 20,287,742 who are Protestant Church members, of which number 39.3 per cent are males." We have therefore, in America, according to the government reports, 7,973,983 men in communion with the Protestant churches.

Dr. Cressy's Study.

In 1903 Frank Graves Cressy, Ph. D., of the Chicago University, made an exhaustive study of the relation of "young" men to the churches, and published the same in book form. His tables have never been called in question, much less disproved. And he showed by reports from seventy-eight select churches, representing all denominations and all parts of the country, that in the Protestant churches 17.9 per cent of the membership was made up of young men between the ages of fifteen and thirty-five. There is no reason to apprehend that the proportions have perceptibly changed since. And that would give us 3,631,505 young men in the Protestant churches of America. As there are said to be 12,079,142 Catholics, of whom 49.3 per cent are males—and they admit to communion very young males—the number of young men over whom that church claims jurisdiction, must run considerably above 2,000,000. But apart from the Catholics, in the Prostestant churches alone are nearly four million young men who have joined upon their own request for admission, and who do not noticeably fall behind the other members in their fidelity. Indeed the same churches which reported that the young men constituted 17.9 per cent of their membership, reported that young men formed 20 per cent of their morning congregations and 30 per cent of the evening attendance.

Young Men's Excuses.

It is true that a good many young men excuse their not going to church on the ground that "they find nothing there worth while." But begging the young men's pardon, it may be questioned whether they are good or even tolerable judges of what is worth while. One Sunday evening in the city of Chicago workers from the Y. M. C. A. counted the attendants at the forty-five theatres of Chicago, and found them to be 17,160, largely young men, and the most crowded audiences were at the places which most openly defied public decency. One thousand and four young men were counted one Sunday afternoon, entering a Chicago billiard saloon, where they stood six deep around the tables betting on the games. There are thousands of such who prefer the vaudeville show and the gambling hell and even worse places to the church, but it is not because what is offered them in these places is "worth while."

"Learned Class" Changing.

The fact is that if our young men once constituted the "learned class" in America, they do so no longer. There are today in American high schools, academies and colleges nearly 50,000 more young women than young men, and if we were to look anywhere for the verdict of the educated and intelligent class upon the value of religion and the comparative merits of the sermon and the play, we would not go to the young men, but to their better educated sisters.

But not all young men in America assert "the church has nothing for them." Fifty-three percent of the 101,188 young men in our 464 colleges are church members and have found religion worth while. Eighty per cent of the students at Princeton University are members of Protestant churches; and, as we showed in The Advance recently, of the two hundred young men holding positions of trust and importance whom we personally interviewed, sixty-two per cent were found to be members of evangelical churches and many of the rest "regular attendants." The young man who prefers the billiard saloon or the ball park to the church on Sunday, may belong to the majority, but he does not belong to the intelligent or well employed majority; and he is to be pitied, not praised.

The Leaves

By Rev. E. F. Wright.

I said good-bye to the little leaves,
As falling one by one
From the boughs of my beloved trees,
When the autumn days had come.

I saw them come in the early spring,
I saw them each unfold;
I heard them in the breezes sing
Their songs, so weird and old.

I saw them with rain drops play,
And meet the driving storm;
I saw them at the close of day,
Fresh as a summer's morn.

I saw them clasp each other's hands
And form a shady glen
For some poor, stricken, wounded beast,
Away from the haunts of men.

And then I saw them turn to gold,
A reminder of their worth.
Ere they released their loving hold
To give themselves to earth.

And like the falling autumn leaves
We too, are pasing on,
And soon these garnered, human sheaves
Will to the earth return.

But let us like these little guests
In summer to us given,
Be always making our bequests,
Thus making earth a heaven.

Watching for Souls

"They Watch in Behalf of Your Souls." Hebrews 13:17

BY G. CAMPBELL MORGAN

"Watching for souls" was a common phrase in the speech of our fathers. It has largely fallen out of use in the Christian church in the present day, or it is carelessly used, with sad ignorance of its Biblical sanctions and its proper values. It is, nevertheless, an illuminative and forceful phrase warranted by the whole Biblical revelation, and remarkably focused in my text, "They watch in behalf of your souls."

We shall consider, first, the Biblical sanctions of this word of the writer of the letter, and, secondly, some of its immediate applications.

Commencing with the Biblical sanctions, we are, first, quite simply and necessarily arrested by the central word, the word that gives thought and meaning and direction to the whole conception, "They watch." What is it to watch? If I take the word translated watch, and feel my way into its heart, I find that it suggests sleeplessness. Thayer says that the word has in it "an image drawn from shepherds," and at once, if we recognize that fact, the ampler atmosphere into which we are introduced is suggested. As a sprig of heather suggests the Highlands, or a spray of edelweiss suggests Alpine heights, so this word admits us into the atmosphere of the divine conception and method.

A Shepherd.

"Jehovah is my Shepherd," said one lonely singer millenniums ago; and down the millenniums and through the centuries his song has been taken up and repeated in lonely hours, in the midst of the rush of life, and as men have crossed the desert where no water is. It is the profoundest word concerning God in his attitude toward the sons of men in their sorrow and in their sin. It is a word which has within it all the other great facts concerning him. It is the synonym for his Kingship. It is the revelation of the meaning of his Fatherhood. So we start with that fundamental truth that kingship in the divine economy is shepherdhood, that God is King because he is Shepherd, and that his activity of sovereignty is for evermore the activity of his Shepherd heart. That is fundamental.

We turn from that fundamental word of the psalm, and go through the prophetic writings, selecting one only from the mass of material—that in Ezekiel, perhaps the most graphic of them all, in which we have the picture of the sheep scattered, and hear the thunder of the Divine denunciation, not of the sheep but of the shepherds. Those who should have bound up their wounds and healed the sick and sought the lost, and folded the flock and fed them; all these, said Ezekiel, had fed themselves instead of the sheep. Therein lay the supreme condemnation of the false shepherds.

Moved With Compassion.

I pass from these Old Testament Scriptures with the fundamental song of the Shepherdhood of Jehovah, and I come to the New Testament. I read that when Jesus saw the multitudes he was moved with compassion, and the reason was that he saw them as sheep having no shepherd. I go a little further on in the days of his public ministry, and hear him describing his mission in this selfsame figure, "I am the Good Shepherd." The hireling—mark the infinite scorn of it, the satire of Jesus—the hireling "fleeth because he is a hireling." The Good Shepherd whose own the sheep are enters into conflict with the wolf, grapples with the evil of that beast that spoils the sheep, and dies in the conflict. In that infinite mystery which is the heart of Christianity, exhausting all figures, he declares, "I lay down my life for the sheep . . . I lay down my life that I may take it again," thus prophesying the resurrection whereby he is able not merely to slay the wolf, but to communicate to the sheep the virtue and force of his own life that they themselves may be made strong against the marauding wolf. Finally, interpreting the word of Jesus to Peter by all the symbolism of the ancient economy and the attitude of the heart of Christ, I hear him charge the Christian man that it is his work to be a shepherd, to watch for souls.

Would Not Recognize Classes.

Jesus went through all the cities and villages preaching, teaching, healing; and he saw the multitudes, the multitudes of the cities, villages and hamlets, rich and poor, high and low, learned and illiterate, massed humanity. It would in some senses be a most inaccurate thing to say that Jesus never saw whether a man was rich or poor; it would in some senses not be true to say that He was unconscious of the phylacteries that were upon the garments of the Pharisees, or of the rags of the beggar; but in a profound and deep sense I do affirm he was unconscious of all these things. He was not attracted by wealth, he was not attracted by poverty. Let me change the tense to the present. Christ cannot be the Head of a labor church, he cannot be the Head of a capitalist club; but he is in the club where wealth gathers, he is present when poverty is urging its necessity and grappling with its problem. He is attracted by humanity, indifferent to the false divisions in his passion for humanity and his determination ultimately to destroy the divisions that separate, and to create one flock and one Shepherd, the very Kingdom of God. He was conscious, and he is conscious today, of the scattered sheep, the fleeced, wounded sheep, the harried, worried souls of men. That is the condition that Ezekiel saw, the condition that Christ apprehended, and which exists until this moment.

Throbs With Agony.

This London of ours teems and throbs with agony and unrest; sheep having no shepherd, the prey of wolves that ravin, marauding by night and prowling by day, and stripping men of the things most precious to them. This is Christ's outlook; the Kingdom is not yet, the children are not home, the sheep are not folded. That vision of the condition of humanity is part of the light focused in my text, "They watch in behalf of your souls."

I have thus, so far, attempted merely the interpretation of the Biblical sanctions that lie behind this great text. Now I desire to turn, in the second place, to the practical, immediate application of this truth.

Vision of the Ultimate.

The first thing we need if we are to watch for souls is a clear vision of the ultimate. The responsibilities of the immediate result always from the nature of the ultimate. Watch a builder at his work, at his one small corner of the building! Why that accuracy of eye and the corrective precision of the plummet that every single brick be truly laid? Because, if not to him, at least to the architect under whose inspirations he labors, the ultimate building is in view. That was what Michael Angelo meant when he said that trifles make perfection. That was why he spent so many hours perfecting the curves in the marble. He had seen the angel in the marble, and every movement of the chisel and hammer was directed toward the final, the ultimate. I am more and more convinced that one of the perils of our day in Christian service is that we are so intent upon the near, so occupied with the immediate, that we fail sometimes to lift our eyes and look toward the ultimate; we lose the vision of God's final victory, and so we fail to do the finest work.

The ultimate in the work of Christ is the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth; the ultimate in the work of Christ is one flock and the one Shepherd. It is when that ultimate glory has broken upon the soul and possessed it, when that gleaming splendor of the final day of God has surcharged the life of the shepherd; it is then that the immediate becomes instinct with meaning, and that, to quote the apostle Paul's great word, we labor "that we may present every man perfect in Christ."

The Immediate.

If in order to fulfilment of this ideal of watching for souls a vision of the ultimate is necessary, then also a vision of the immediate is necessary. Here I would speak with great carefulness and with great sympathy, and with strong conviction. Look out over the world today, look out over our own city, our own land today, and we see multitudes; we meet them every day, passing through their midst on the highways of the city, gazing upon them when they are massed for sport or spectacle or tragedy. How do we see them? Comfortable, respectable, fairly moral? Are we satisfied with the condition of the multitudes? Then we have not Christ's vision, and that because we lack the life that makes the light as we look. The vision of Christ was one that clearly saw the magnificence and possibility of humanity within the economy and purpose of God, the glory of the race; and that clear vision of the dignity of humanity, of the worth of one soul, of the splendid possibility of human life, created his vision of the ruin and the failure of humanity. You and I will be watchers for souls of men until we see the glory of God's thoughts for them, and in the light of that see the awfulness of their failure.

Our Business.

From these general words of application let me pass, in conclusion, to some particular words. We must recognize in the life and work of this church and of all churches, that this is our business. Our business is to attach men to Christ. Here are the perils which threaten us in Christian work—the peril that we should attach men to ourselves, and the peril that we attach them to our church. The peril is that the preacher should imagine that when he has gathered a crowd about himself he has done Christ's work. No. I know how this thing searches, how it creates the doubt as to whether there may not be failure in the very fact that

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

The Woman Suffrage Movement

In our last Study of Woman's Organizations, it was pointed out that, at the Woman's Rights Convention in 1848, the right of suffrage was not only asked for women, but the same social, legal, industrial and educational rights as men; all of these are now freely conceded to her, except the ballot. The question may occur to some at this point:

"If women have been successful along the lines mentioned, why have they not been equally successful in gaining the same political rights as men?"

At the start public opinion was as much opposed to women in education, and in the trades and professions, as to women having the ballot, but popular opinion was not vested with the right to grant or refuse them entrance therein. A woman brave enough to establish a school on new lines, and a few patrons brave enough to furnish pupils, and the experiment in education was launched—and being a righteous experiment it grew and prospered. So with the opening of the occupations and professions; a few women felt the necessity and the impulse toward certain lines of labor; they were strong and steadfast enough to stick to them in spite of public clamor and caricature—and lo, the professions were open to women!

The Line of Greatest Resistance.

But with the political privileges, the popular will could not only ridicule and protest, it could withhold; so here we have the line of greatest resistance, here, consequently, the least progress. Before the franchise can be given to women in any state, there has to be an amendment to the state constitution, striking the word male out of the suffrage clause in it; the usual method of amending a state constitution is to pass a Bill through both houses of the legislature by a two-thirds majority, and then submit it to a vote of the people at a following general election. When we consider that all the voters are men, some with prejudices and strong convictions against giving the ballot to women, it is not surprising that progress has been slow.

The Woman's Rights convention continued to be held annually from 1848 to 1861, when they were suspended on account of the Civil War. But in May 1869, the National Woman Suffrage Association, was formed in New York City, having for its sole object the enfranchisement of women. The educational, industrial and social rights for which they had pleaded twenty-one years before were now in a fair way of accomplishment—henceforth their one aim was to secure political rights as well.

Recent Woman Suffrage Convention.

A brief account of the recent convention of the National Woman Suffrage Association in Louisville, Kentucky, may best mark the growth of the movement, and its present outlook. Since the organization of the society in 1869, six states have given women full suffrage—Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Washington and California. In one state, Kansas, women have full municipal suffrage, in five states tax paying women have a limited suffrage and in twenty-nine states they have school suffrage. In three states Oregon, Kansas and Wisconsin, amendments to the constitution have passed their legislatures, and will be submitted to the electors at the next general election.

As the two great states, Washington and California, had enfranchised their women since the last annual meeting, this gathering was a celebration as well as a convention. The first evening was Jubilee Night, when the Washington and California delegations told the story of their victories, and all felt they were on the eve of still greater triumphs. Not only will the votes of these women be a factor in their own states, but it makes the women's vote something to be reckoned with in national elections. Next year more than half a million women will be qualified to vote for President—which is more than the usual presidential plurality.

Notable for Distinguished Women.

The convention was notable for the number of distinguished women on the program. From England, there was Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, leader of the militant suffrage movement, and Mrs. T. P. O'Connor, wife of the Irish leader in Parliament. Mrs. Pankhurst won many hearts by her lovely personality and brilliant pleas for "one half the human race," as she styled the suffrage cause. Miss Mary Johnston, the popular southern novelist, Mrs. Ernest Thompson-Seton, Eliza Calvert Hare, author of Aunt Jane of Kentucky, Miss M. Carey Thomas, of Bryn Mawr College, Mrs. Bartlett Crane, Miss Fola LaFolette, Dr. Harvey Wiley, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, and last and best, Miss Jane Addams, were also among the speakers.

Miss Jane Addams, Miss Sophronisba Breckenridge and Mrs. Robert LaFolette, wife of the distinguished senator and presidential candidate, were elected officers of the association.

Louisville Enthusiasm.

Louisville is a conservative old southern city, and it was not thought the convention would attract much attention or approval. But from the first night, the standing room only sign failed to express the attendance; on several evenings all vacant seats were filled an hour before the appointed time, and crowds were turned away every night; even the expedient of charging fifty cents admission failed to reduce the numbers. The patience and sympathy of the audience was remarkable in view of the discomfort of those who stood throughout the program of two or more hours.

College Women Enlisted.

One of the most hopeful signs of the growth of the Woman Suffrage idea was the large number of college women who have enlisted in the movement. These brilliant young students represent the highest type of educated American womanhood; there are now Equal Suffrage Leagues in fifty-five of our leading colleges. One evening was devoted to this work and Miss Carey Thomas, president of Bryn Mawr, told how the spirit is pervading college life today; she said the irresistible argument to win the doubtful and indifferent was, that the ballot would enable them to help the weak, the erring, the unfortunate, among women and children. The same note was struck by Miss Addams, Mrs. Pankhurst and others—that the problems of child labor, of the working woman, of the white slave traffic could best be solved by giving women the franchise. Miss Breckenridge said:

"I want the ballot, because it is only fair that women should have the chance of controlling, in a definite and powerful way, the forces which act for good and for evil in our homes and in our country."

This altruistic spirit pervaded the entire convention. The appeal of Woman Suffrage to most women today is not for rights for themselves, but for the right to help those who cannot help themselves.

Women of Note

—Miss Martha Stark has been appointed by the health commissioner of Boston as head nurse of the new school hygiene bureau at a salary of $1,500 a year. Miss Stark has been superintendent of the District Nurses' Association, which covers the state of Massachusetts and of which Mrs. E. A. Codman is the president.

—The duchess of Albany is said to be responsible for the popularity of rowing among English women. She arises early each morning and drives in her trap from her home at Claremont-Esher to Hampton Court Bridge, where she rows one measured mile on the Thames. The duchess is the widow of the first duke of Albany, who died in 1884, two years after their marriage.

—Mrs. Lora Simons Carey, to whose memory a tablet was recently unveiled at Princeton, Ill., died at the early age of thirty years. On reaching Harpoot, Turkey, a missionary, ten years ago, she found hundreds of widows and children left destitute by recent massacres, and to aid them started a lace industry which has proven a great help. She had charge of a young married women's class, and taught them to be Christ-like home-makers. They loved her, and her picture still hangs on the walls of their homes.

—Suffragettes, in pursuance of the policy of militant tactics recently revived, invaded the City Temple, London, last week and by noisy interruptions prevented Premier Asquith from delivering a speech on settlement work. The premier, after repeated efforts to get a hearing left the church in disgust.

—Mrs. John F. Kidder is the only woman railroad president west of the Rocky mountains and she is about to give up her activities because she is tired of business life and wants to travel. Mrs. Kidder inherited from her husband some years ago a fortune of $1,000,000, including the control of the Nevada County Narrow Gauge railroad, California.

—Miss Fannie Crosby, the blind hymn writer, who is 92 years old, was presented at the thirty-second annual celebration of the Bowery mission in New York lately, where, as a young woman, she had worked to save those who had drifted there. She made a speech to the "spiritual sons of her boys," as she puts it.

—Mrs. Ellen Rose of Buena Vista, Pa., is carrying on a unique business among women—pumping sand and coal from the bottom of the Susquehanna river. Although Mrs. Rose has passed her seventieth year, she directs her force of fifteen workmen personally, going out with them every morning and visiting them several times a day to see that everything is going right.

—Mrs. Florence Howe Hall, a daughter of Julia Ward Howe, delivered the opening address at the twenty-first state convention of the New Jersey Woman Suffrage association at Passaic. She spoke against militant methods.

—Queen Elizabeth of Belgium is taking steps to revive the making of Brussels lace by the girls and women of her country. She is having lace making taught in the industrial schools, and has formed a company with a capital of $27,000 for the purpose of getting the lace to higher priced markets, particularly in the larger American cities.

—Mrs. Maria Hopkins has been the organist of the Congregational church at Norridgewock, Me., for 62 years. She is now 72 years old, and lives in the same house where she was born and where her father was born.

How Elsie Saw the Circus

BY FRED MYRON COLBY.

Every boy and girl dearly loves to go to a circus, and so when little Elsie Clark, on her way home from school saw the flaming bills of the "Greatest Show on Earth" pasted on neighbor Brown's big barn, the girl naturally expressed herself as desirous of being present at that delectable exhibition. She ran home with flying feet, her head full of the sense of the vivid pictures of the dashing horses, the trained elephants, the caged lions and bears, and the whole glittering paraphernalia of the "Greatest Conglomeration of Eccentricities."

"Oh, ma!" she exclaimed, as she rushed into the house, "there's going to be a circus here next week, and mayn't I go?"

Good Mrs. Clark looked up from her ironing (it was Wednesday afternoon) and her flushed, tired face lighted at her daughter's voice, but her answer was not reassuring.

"I don't know what your father will think about it," she said. "It is a very busy season and money is scarce, and you know our mortgage is not paid yet. But you can ask him."

And Elsie did ask him when he came in to supper, tired and hungry, telling him all about the big colored posters with their great display of marvels.

"What day is it?" he asked.

"One week from tomorrow," replied Elsie, "and, oh, mayn't I go?" "We'll see, child, we'll see. Quarters are pretty scarce, but we'll see."

Elsie was not exactly sure what that meant, but she had confidence in her father, and she knew that if it was possible he would give his consent when the time came, for he was a kind and devoted parent.

The Clarks lived about a mile out of a small New Hampshire village, on a large farm which was not wholly paid for, and Elsie, a girl of twelve, helped a great deal about the place, for this was back in the "fifties" and girls and boys were not afraid of work in those days. She made the beds and fed the chickens and harnessed the horses, and often helped spread and rake hay in the field, for there were no boys in the Clark family, and Elsie was a brown and healthy as a young Arab.

She did not say anything more about the circus for several days, but every night she dreamed of the great show, and every day the desire grew greater and greater to go and see its splendid realities. A circus and menagerie was not of every day occurrence, and she felt that if she could only go and see all that aggregation of wonders it would be the day of her life. To stir Elsie's desire all the more, nearly all of her friends and schoolmates had proudly announced that they were going, and Jim Crane, her next door neighbor had boastingly shown a brand-new silver quarter that his father had given him for admission to the show. Elsie felt that if she only had a quarter she would give anything in the world.

The days hurried by, and before she hardly realized it a week had passed. The morning of the circus arrived bright and sunny—an ideal day for merry-making. Elsie's heart was all in a flutter as her father came in and sat down at the breakfast table.

"Well, Honey," he said, "I am afraid we can't quite afford the quarter this year, but your mother and I have been talking it over, and if you will harness old Dan, after the chores are done, you and she can ride over to town and see the parade. That will be better than nothing, won't it, Elsie?" and he leaned over and patted her blonde curls.

"Oh, yes, father," she answered, though there was a lump in her throat, "that will be real nice. I wish you could go too."

"I have all the fence to look after down in the lower meadow lot," declared the farmer, "and I have got to hustle. I am awfully sorry, little girl, that you can't go to the circus, but have as good a time as you can, and don't worry about my dinner."

"You are a dear good father," cried Elsie, kissing him, and somehow or other it didn't seem such a deprivation after all.

After her father's departure Elsie helped do the dishes and make the beds, and then she went to the barn to brush off Dan, and harness and have him ready before she dressed. The parade was set at eleven o'clock, and it was a mile and a half to the village; and they wanted to be there in good season to see it all.

It was a warm, sultry June morning with a good deal of moisture in the air, and as Elsie was throwing the harness on Dan's back she heard the mutter of thunder. Sure enough there was an angry cloud coming up in the west, and standing in the doorway of the barn she could see the sky gradually become overcast with the dark, threatening clouds. A shower was surely coming on and likely as not it would prevent them from seeing the parade.

She hitched Dan to the carriage and leaving him standing on the barn floor, Elsie was about to go to the house when she was startled by a disturbance behind the barn. The hens were cackling, the pigs were squealing, the cows were lowing and there was a general commotion. Such an uproar betokened some dire calamity, the nature of which she had no idea. But she was not long in finding out.

Back of the barn stood a pig-shed, a small, wooden building, with a stout rail fence on one side of it and connected with it by a sliding wooden door. Within this shed and enclosure were kept half a dozen young porkers which were being fed for the winter market, and with which Mr. Clark contemplated paying off the last of the mortgage on his farm. It was toward this spot that Elsie's feet were directed by the increasing turmoil. What she saw for a moment almost paralyzed her.

In the midst of the enclosure was a long, lithe, tawny-colored creature, with eyes like burning coals, engaged in the somewhat arduous task of carrying off one of the young swine who was wriggling desperately and making the most vociferous squeals. Elsie had no idea what the animal was or how dangerous it might be, but she was not disposed to see one of her father's cherished porkers carried away without at least interposing a protest. Seizing a hoe, the only weapon at hand, she sallied to the pig's defense. Mounting the rail fence she struck vigorously at the animal, but this only made the creature growl more fiercely while he showed no disposition to relinquish his attack upon the pig. Elsie was not to be nonplussed, however. Springing over the fence into the enclosure the plucky girl attacked the animal in the rear. Just at that moment there came a severe clap of thunder, almost deafening in its detonation. The discharge of celestial artillery together with the girl's amazing and unexpected attack seemed to have the effect of confounding the animal, and to Elsie's surprise, the beast relinquished its hold of the frenzied pig and rushed into the piggery. Quick as a flash Elsie closed the sliding door and made it fast. Whatever the animal might be she had it safely imprisoned, with no danger of its getting free.

The rain was now falling in torrents, and Elsie ran into the barn and stood by the side of Dan until it was over. Her father also came up from the field, "wet as a drowned rat," as he expressed it, and you can imagine his surprise and amazement as Elsie related her adventure

"It was as big as a calf, father," she said; "What kind of a creature can it be?"

"It must be a panther, child, but how did you dare to attack it? It might have torn you to pieces."

"I thought only of saving the pig, father, and the animal never showed a disposition to turn upon me."

"More than likely the beast has escaped from the circus," declared Mr. Clark; "a wild panther would have been more ferocious. Anyway you were lucky not to get hurt."

Mr. Clark's suggestion proved to be a fact, for before the shower was over a carriage drove up with two men in it who, upon alighting immediately made known their errand.

"One of our cougars escaped from its cage last night. The animal was seen to make its way in this direction. Have you seen or heard anything of such a creature?" inquired one of the men.

"Do you think you would know the beast, if you should see it?" returned Mr. Clark, in the usual Yankee manner.

"Certainly we would,—a huge ferocious creature. I would know it among a hundred."

"Well, I guess Elsie can show you the animal. She has it caged."

"What do you mean? This girl—how did she secure it?"

"The brute was trying to make away with one of my pigs, and she drove him into the piggery and fastened him up. I reckon the animal is safe enough."

"And you did this?" said one of the men, regarding Elsie with an incredulous look. "You certainly did what most men would have hesitated to do. We will see that you are well paid for it."

A visit to the piggery showed that the cougar was in secure quarters. One of the men returned to the village to obtain a wagon and the necessary help to take the animal back to his cage. When the work was accomplished the manager thrust a number of brand-new five dollar bills into Elsie's hands and tickets to the circus for the entire family. So although Elsie failed to witness the street parade as she had planned she did see the circus. And I dare say there was not a happier girl in the whole crowd than was Elsie Clark as she sat with one hand in her father's, and witnessed the entire performance of the "Vast Conglomeration of Eccentricities."

There is many and many a single praying soul, poor men and women in obscurity and poverty, that God's angels dwell with more abundantly than with those who stand in the conspicuity of exhibitive holiness. The higher Life is very low. "He that would be chief among you, let him be your slave; let him be minister of all."—Henry Ward Beecher.

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

H. W. Thoreson has removed from Tomson to accept the pastorate at El Paso.

West Salem Church is pastorless, due to the resignation of G. W. Ford, who has become pastor at Bement.

Evangelist Irwin and wife held a brief meeting at Pleasant Plains, resulting in a number of additions to the congregation.

In January, the church at Noble will have Evangelist J. Bennett and Mr. Cassel for a revival meeting. The minister is M. O. Dutcher.

Farmer City Church and its pastor, R. E. Stephenson, are being assisted in a meeting by Evangelists C. R. L. Vawter and C. E. Marty.

J. A. Baugh held a meeting at a country church in Edwards County, which lasted for two weeks and resulted in seven additions, six being on profession of faith.

J. A. Barnett dedicated the church at Oreana the first Sunday in December. Mr. Barnett was at one time pastor of this church, which is now ministered to to by Fred Galliger.

R. E. Hieronymus, formerly president of Eureka College, delivered his lecture on the "Passion Play" at Beardstown Church. The lecture is very highly spoken of by those in attendance.

Following the union tabernacle meeting at Palestine, Pastor D. W. Connor of the Christian Church is holding a revival meeting, in which, at last report, there had been forty-eight additions.

Moline Church and W. B. Slater, the pastor, will have the assistance of G. E. Crist of Ohio as director of the music, in a revival meeting to be held after the first of the year.

I. W. Lowman led the New Douglas Church in a revival meeting, which resulted in twelve additions, all but two being conversions. Mr. Lowman was assisted by his daughter, Golda, who had charge of the music.

Carlinville congregation profited by an evangelistic campaign, conducted by the pastor, J. W. Porter, with the assistance of Guy B. Williamson, pastor of Waverly Church. There were seven additions.

There were seven additions to the membership on a recent Sunday in Hamilton Church, to which J. Ross Miller preaches. On the same Sunday, a sum of money sufficient to liquidate all indebtedness on the church, was raised.

H. H. Peters, financial secretary of Eureka College, was honored with the chaplaincy of the Oddfellows of Illinois. In connection with his office, it is the expectation of Mr. Peters to deliver a number of lectures on Oddfellowship.

The church at Sumner is being re-organized by J. E. Stout. Response to the evangelist's appeal, early in the meeting, brought forward almost sixty, to form the nucleous of the new orgaization.

J. W. Porter, who has been pastor of Carlinville Church for a year and a half, preaches his farewell sermon for that congregation the last Sunday in December, having accepted the pastorate at Rantoul, where he begins his new work the first of January.

Evangelist Joel Brown of Iowa, assisted by a singer, is in a revival meeting at Fulton. This is a mission congregation, and any outside assistance for the meeting will be gladly received.

Adam K. Adcock closed a meeting for his home congregation, which resulted in about forty additions. He was assisted by G. E. Crist as director of music. The meeting is said to have been one of the best held by the congregation for many years.

The concluding Sundays of Russell F. Thrapp's pastorate at Jacksonville resulted in thirty-nine additions, twelve of these being the last day. Mr. Thrapp had been with this church for ten years, and assumed the leadership of First Church, Los Angeles, the tenth of December.

At Fairbury, C. H. Hands of the Christian Church, delivered the Thanksgiving sermon which was listened to by a very large congregation, on the evening preceding Thanksgiving Day. The local papers gave extended notice to the service, and a liberal amount of space to the sermon.

Brownstown congregation is erecting a new building at a cost of sixteen thousand dollars which, it is anticipated, will be completed for occupancy by the first of January. S. F. Fannon is pastor, and has the co-operation of the entire church membership and the esteem of the whole community.

The Scoville meeting at Pontiac had resulted in more than two hundred additions at last report. Mr. Scoville's meeting is said to be exceeding the result of Mr. Sunday's meeting, held there several years ago. It is a union campaign, with practically all of the churches of the town co-operating.

The church at Rosiclare has secured the services of J. H. Thomas of Kentucky, as pastor. This congregation has recently been re-organized under the evangelistic ministry of Edward C. Wilson, who succeeded in establishing unity and in adding eleven members to the congregation.

John R. Golden's meeting held for Pastor Jenner and the Stuart Street Church, Springfield, resulted in thirty-four additions to the membership and an added impetus to the church's activity. Perhaps the meeting's chief value was in the enlarged vision and faith growing out of the instructive messages for Christian living and devotion.

W. H. Storm has become pastor of Toulon Church. Mr. Storm has for the past three years been pastor at Cissna Park of a Union Church which has grown splendidly under his ministry. To manifest their appreciation, on his last visit to the town, more than a hundred citizens co-operated in a farewell reception, and in presenting the minister with a substantial gift of gold.

W. F. Turner and the Peoria Church are in a splendid Sunday-school campaign with Miss Eva Lamert as leader. An attendance of 666 was the aim for Nov. 26, and 602 were present. The first two weeks are devoted to increasing the membership. The last week will be devoted to organization of classes and conferences on ways and means of conserving the new forces added and to the efficiency of every department of the school.

F. W. Burnham has been pastor of First Church, Springfield, five years. On accepting the pastorate, it was understood by both congregation and minister that the period of employment should be for five years. This term expiring the first of January, the congregation recently, on advice of the Official Board, extended an invitation to Mr. Burnham to remain another five years, with an increase of salary. This pastor and church are in the midst now of building the finest edifice among the Christian churches of Illinois. The building is enclosed, and the interior work is progressing rapidly. It is expected the building will be entirely complete and ready for dedication by the first of March or April.

Secretary's Letter.

J. R. Golden, of the West Side Church, Springfield, has the joy of seeing the cause prosper under his leadership, and of preaching to the largest audiences since going to Springfield. He was recently honored by being elected president of the Ministerial Association of the city. Mr. Golden is secretary of the Fifth district.

L. S. Harrington will soon close his work at Bellflower and is open for another field. Write him direct.

C. W. Marlow of Flora, says: "Our work is in a flourishing condition; never worked with a more loyal people."

Wm. F. Hole of Ambia, Ind., will close his work with the Prairie Green Church in Iroquois county January 1. They will want another man for half time. The clerk is O. M. Miller, Wellington, Ill.

It is quite noticeable, more so than usual it seems, how many clerks and preachers in sending the offerings for state missions declare their deep interest in the state work, wish the offerings were larger and send their prayers along with the drafts and money orders. Such manifest interest and serious concern for this cause is encouraging.

The brethren at La Fayette are very anxious to locate some Disciples in business in their town. There ore good openings for a physician, a barber, a hardware merchant, a drug store, and a new hotel is going up which will need a proprietor. For futher information write Mrs. C. H. Baker.

Cassius Garst of Stanford has located with the church at Irving full time. This is his first regular work and we predict that the Stanford church will always be proud of him.

If your offerings for state missions has been taken, please ask the treasurer why it has not been forwarded to us. Find out who is holding it and why. Some offerings do not reach us for several months.

J. FRED JONES, Field Secretary.
W. D. DEWEESE, Office Sec'y-Treas.

men and women gather about a ministry. I must be true to God and my soul. If I do but gather here men and women to hear me, I am of all failures the most terrible.

If that is our business we must prepare ourselves to the enterprise. We must partake of the shepherd nature, have the shepherd heart. It is through manifestation of the Shepherd that we must lead souls to him.

Must Know How.

Our responsibility is also that of availing ourselves of the resources at our disposal. If I am to feed the flock of God I must be familiar with the sustenance of souls. I must be a student of the Word of God, not merely of its technicalities, but of its dynamic. I must be a man of prayer, or, as I prefer now to put it, I must be a man often talking with the Shepherd himself if I am to help him in his shepherd work.

Then it is not merely necesssary that we recognize this as our business, and not merely necessary that we prepare ourselves for this enterprise; we must actually give ourselves to the business. That is the business of the preacher in his study, in his pulpit, in his social relationships. Woe be to the minister of Jesus Christ who establishes social relationships with his people of such a nature that he is not able to talk to them about their souls. Woe be to any man in the ministry who becomes so friendly with a member of his congregation at the club that he cannot grip him on the matter of God and eternity when occasion arises.

A Work for All.

That is true of the teacher in the class. Dear fellow-worker in this great enterprise, teacher in the Sunday-school, what are the children and young people gathered about you for? They create your opportunity to lead them to Christ. It is true of all office-bearers in the church. It is true of the men who seat this congregation; it is true of those who sing in the choir; it is true of those who preside over the finances of the church. The ultimate reason of everything must be to lead men to his open side, the sheep for whom the Shepherd died.

It is true of the church in the neighborhood in which it exists and in its world relationships. The church has nothing to do with social relationships, apart from its insistence upon the necessity that men shall find their way to Christ. If men want me to come out and help in their fight to get better conditions, I will come, provided always they will crown my King. My business is to present men to Christ and Christ to men in individual life, and then, upon the basis of regenerate humanity, to reconstruct society.

This is the business of every church member. This is your central responsibility at home. Fathers and mothers, the supreme word of your parenthood is this—watching for souls.

May that God, who is the Shepherd of humanity, and who has revealed himself in the one who is the good, the great, the true Shepherd, lead all those of us who rejoice in his Shepherdhood into such fellowship with himself, that of us also it may be said, "They watch in behalf of souls."

Theology is rather a divine life than a divine knowledge. In heaven, indeed, we shall first see and then love; but here on earth we must first love, and then will open our eyes as well as our hearts; and we shall then see and perceive and understand.—Jeremy Taylor.

The Family Altar League

W. E. Biederwolf, General Secretary.

The Family Altar League, which has been working steadily along for three years seems to be destined to become a permanent factor in the redigious activities of the church in general.

It is estimated that 14,000 lives are now being daily touched and influenced by family prayers through the work of this organiza-

The plan of operation is a simple one. In brief, all families taking a solemn covenant to maintain family worship, and are enrolled in the League. An aristic wall card is sent to such family as a constant reminder of this covenant. A systematic effort is then made to help these familiies in their religious life by furnishing them with daily Bible readings.

The work is interdenominational, and all contested points of doctrine are carefully avoided, as the ai mof thereadings is a purely devotional one. It is not without significance that large numbers of ecclesiastical bodies of all denominations in their annual gatherings have passed commendatory resolutions concerning the work of the Family Altar League, and earnestly urge the pastors to hold a Family Altar Day in their churches on some convenient Sabbath. What better thing could any such religious gathering do, and it would be well if every such body in the United States would give attention to this, and pass some similar resolution. The following resolution, similar to which scores have already been passed, serves as an index to what other religious gatherings might profitably do.

"Resolved that the Synod of Oregon heatily approves the purpose and methods of The Family Altar League, and urges all its members to co-operate by a public and private emphasis of this neglected means of grace, and that the subject of Family Religion be presented in all our congregations on some Sunday, to be known in that church as Family Altar Day, with the effort to secure the adoption of the covenant in every Christian household."

The work is entirely non-commercial, a number of God's people giving their time and means to it freely for His sake.

The work is supported by volutary contributions, and any offering, however small, will be greatly appreciated.

Nearly all the literature and printed matter is furnished without cost. Orders of service for Family Altar Day can be had at cost (1.50 per 100) by addressing headquarters of the "Family Altar League," 602 Lakeside Building, Chicago, Ill., where all information may be obtained upon request.

Please send stamps when requesting reply, as the correspondence is very heavy.

Diseases are not the only things that are contagious. Courage is contagious. Kindness is contagious. All the positive virtues with red blood in their veins are contagious. The heaviest blow you can srike at the kingdom of evil is just to follow the advice Sir Walter Scott gave to his son-in-law Lockhart: "Ba a good man." And if you want to know how, there is but one perfect and supreme example, the life of Him who not only did no evil, but went about doing good. The stronghold of intemperance lies in the vacancy and despair of men's minds. The way to attack it is to make the sober life beautiful and happy and full of interest.—Selected.

Church Life

M. W. Harkins and DeLoss Smith will assist Pastor J. Boyd Jones in a meeting with Anderson, Ind., church in January.

The church in Beatrice, Neb., has decided to install a pipe organ to cost $3,000. The organ is to be ready for dedication, March 1, 1912.

Married at the bride's home, Lodi, Calif., Nov. 29, Robert G. Williamson and Anne B. Haley, daughter of J. J. Haley former pastor at Richmond, Va. F. B. Huffman, officiated.

The church at Owasso, Mich., gave a delightful reception to the new pastor, C. R. Wolford and his wife. Four persons were recently received into the church there.

Union Thanksgiving services of a number of the leading churches of the East End, Pittsburgh, were held in the East End Christian Church, of which J. R. Ewers is pastor.

Park Ave. Church, Knoxville, Tenn., has called J. L. Keevil to its pulpit. He leaves the Sherman, Tex., church. His ministry in Sherman and elsewhere has been uniformly successful.

Two Bible classes of young ladies in the Baptist and Disciple churches of Independence, Mo., have united in a "tag day" enterprise to raise money for a Christmas for the poor of the city.

Professor Charles T. Paul of the Missionary Training School, Indianapolis, spoke on a recent Sunday for Pastor C. C. Rowlison in Iowa City, Ia. Professor Paul's theme was "The Present Crisis in China."

A. C. M. S. Evangelist H. F. Lutz, of the Atlantic Coast states, has labored mostly with mission churches during the year, and in nine places has baptized 208 souls and added 90 otherwise.

The weekly bulletin of Uhrichsville, O., church calls attention to the sub-normal proportion of men in its congregation: "The census report shows 60 per cent of the Protestant churches females and 40 per cent males. The Disciples of the nation have 58½ per cent female sand 41½ per cent males. The Uhrichsville church has only 273 male members in a total of 739. To be in the same proportion it should have about 330."

James Small is in a meeting with W. T. Moore at Eustice, Fla. He reports the best church building in the city, and that Dr. Moore preaches to large crowds of tourists during the winter months. Mr. Small goes to Tampa, Fla., for his next meeeting, then to Des Moines, Ia., with H. E. Van Horn.

R. W. Moore, pastor at White Hall, Ill., remains another year at an increase in salary. He reports two additions by baptism, Dec. 3. Mr. Moare would like to exchange meetings with a brother pastor of western Illinois or eastern Missouri. Write him at once if you like the suggestion.

J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis, Mo., has issued a call for funds with which to meet the Disciples' apportionment of the expense of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. Those who bore this expense last year will be glad to repeat their offerings, and no doubt many new givers will be enlisted.

Central Church, Syracuse, N. Y., Arthur Braden pastor, has just concluded a series of special evangelistic meetings. The pastor reports some sixty responses to the invitations. The Kendalls assisted him most satisfactorily in the music and personal work. He commends them heartily. Inasmuch as Central Church is down town, and in a University city, the success was most gratifying to Mr. Braden.

The Christian Century is in receipt of a handsome program of the dedicatory services at Gibson City, Ill.,. L. O. Lehman pastor. S. E. Fisher was the speaker, Dec. 10, at 11 a. m.. Greetings were had from the other churches at the afternoon service. The following speakers were present during the week and made addresses: W. W. Sniff, J. R. Golden, Clarence L. De Pew, H. H. Peters and Dr. A. L. Shelton of Batang, Thibet.

Oklahoma Christian University has 160 acres of land two miles east of the college. Just north of it is another 160 acres owned by a private party that can be used on very reasonable terms. They wish to develop an industrial work that will support a number of young men while in school. A competent man who understands poultry and dairy business and truck farming is needed to organize the undertaking. The right man could do well for himself and perform a great service for the school. Applicants may address President E. V. Zollars, Enid, Okla.

H. E. Beckler, pastor at Springfield, O. writes of the great meeting recently closed at his church. "We closed a two weeks' meeting here with 265 added. J. V. Baird assisted as singer; he did it well. C. S. Brooks preached three nights, J. J. Tisdall six, and I preached the remainder of the time. Closed first year here with 302 added. November 26 was first Sunday of second year; 23 added. Four hundred and seventy-eight in Bible-school Sunday; 152 one year ago. This is one of the best fields in Ohio. Will be in new Sunday-school rooms in two weeks. Then watch us grow."

Disciples of Christ in Alabama, have just celebrated their "Silver Jubilee." Remarkable progress has been made. Just six preachers co-operated in that first convention twenty-five years ago. The record for eight of these intervening years was lost. For the remaining years the following interesting facts are noted by A. R. Moore: "We have raised during the twenty-five years, the eight years missing, $26,448.41; there have been thirty-seven churches and thirty-two Sunday-schools organized; the number or additions received into the church totals, 3,615. The eight years missing are practically one-third of the period, and if we take the average and add one-third for the missing eight years we should have a grand total of forty-two Sunday-schools organized, and 4,820 additions."

A new church edifice was dedicated at Nowata, Okla., on Dec. 3. The new building is modern in all its apartments. The auditorium is forty-eight feet square, containing a fine gallery. The Bible-school room is thirty-two feet by thirty-six feet, with gallery and class-rooms. This opens into the auditorium. Pastor's study, Ladies' parlor, are on first floors. Dining-room, kitchen, robing-room, etc., in basement. The dedicatory service was conducted by George L. Snively. It was necessary to raise $7,000, to provide for the indebtedness of the church. At the morning service, $7,300 was pledged. A few moments at the evening service were taken and $300 more was secured. Immediately following the dedicatory services, D. A. Wickizer, state secretary, began an evangelistic campaign. During the day twenty-nine responded to the invitation. Nineteen of these came at the Sunday-school hour. At least half of these will not be baptized at present, their parents believing them to be too young. The Nowata church is but eighteen months old being ministered to from the date of its organization by William Hamilton, who is also principal of the public school.

The Loyal Berean Bible class of Fowler, Colo., church, L. D. Cartwright, minister, was organized in November of last year. In the eleven months since it has grown to have a total enrollment of eighty-five and an attendance of sixty recently. It is composed of young men and young women above the age of sixteen. The record now gives the young men the greater proportion in both enrollment and attendance. The church there has been organized but a little over a year and as yet the Sunday-school is compelled to meet in a hall over a store. The class obtained the "kitchen and pantry" for their meeting place, but have since had to include the hallway as well. Thus they are using three rooms. The organization is simple, following the adult Bible class standard exactly. The social side is emphasized and made rather prominent in the work of the class. Among other events, during the year, the class has conducted a "Yale-Harvard Track Meet," a "Honeymoon Trip" and a "Campfire Party" given by the girls. The social committee has for its aim to make it so "warm" for the stranger when he comes to the class that he will want to come back again and become a member. It seldom fails.

J. T. McGarvey has resigned the pastorate of Woodward Ave. Church, Detroit, Mich. He returns to Lexington, Ky., to settle the estate of his sainted father, J. W. McGarvey, and to write a biography of his father.

Atchison, Kan., reports a great day, Dec. 3. 450 in the Sunday-school with an offering of $686 from the school. Twenty-two young young people responded to the invitation to accept Christ. Jesse Bader is pastor there.

Mark Wayne Williams, Milwaukee, Wis., has returned home after having finished a meeting with his brother Herman P. Williams pastor of the church at Albuqurque, N. M. There were fifty additions.

E. N. Duty, closes his ministry at Minerva, Ohio, Dec. 31, having accepted a call to First Church, Charleroi, Pa., where he begins his pastorate, Jan. 1.

The Mississippi State Convention, which was held at Greenwood, recently pledged $10,000 to the support of Southern Christian College. A whirlwind campaign is now on to raise an adequate endowment fund.

The district convention of the churches of West Texas and South Central New Mexico, was held in First Church, El Paso, Nov. 29-Dec. 2. An excellent program and a large attendance were reported.

Charles E. McVay is assisting the church at Yellow Grass, Saskatchewan, Canada., in a meeting. The minister, R. W. Madden is preaching. The church membership is 140. The outlook is bright there for a good meeting and also for the future of the work.

Ralph C. Harding, pastor of the Stockton, Kan., church has resigned to accept the pastorate of Central Park Church at Topeka, Kan. The Stockton church has had a short career but now has 400 members and the finest church building in the county. The church has prospered under the leadership of Mr. Stockton.

C. C. Dobbs of Longmont, Colo., has just closed a good meeting with J. Arthur Dillinger at Littleton, Colo. There were thirty-one added, twenty-six by confession. The Littleton pulpit will be open after the first of the year. Any minister wishing to come to Colorado, who will take a growing church at a small salary should write to the pastor.

Russell F. Thrapp preached his farewell sermon at Jacksonville, Ill., Nov. 26, and has departed for his new work in Los Angeles, Calif. His ministry covers a period of twenty years. The Jacksonville papers speak in the highest terms of his life and ministry. Mr. Thrapp was especially active in the long struggle with the liquor forces of Jacksonville. Twelve persons were added to the church Nev. 26.

The city of Canton, Missouri, and all of Lewis County, voted "dry," by a majority of 593 votes at the local option election, December 2, and by May 1, 1912 the last saloon in the county will be closed. This is another advance step for Christian University, located in Canton. President Johann, with all his faculty and students, joined heartily in this campaign, and their efforts were deciding factors in the fight.

Cloyd Goodnight and his excellent church at Shelbyville, Ind., recently closed a seventeen day's meeting with home forces. Mr. Charles Daugherty of Indianapolis, had charge of the music; his solo work brought forth warm expressions of appreciation from all who heard him. There were twenty-six confessions, mostly from the Sunday-school; thirteen were received by letter and upon confession. It was a quiet meeting which has materially added to the church forces.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

THE SIGNS INDICATE AN UNPRECEDENTED INCREASE IN VOLUME OF ORDERS FOR THE WINTER QUARTER

Chancellor Louis Cupp, of Christian University, Canton, Missouri, announces that the friend who recently gave $25,000 for the erection of a dormitory for the school, has now added $25,000 more, with which to build a gymnasium, to be completely furnished with modern apparatus, shower-baths, and swimming-pool. The entire $50,000 has been paid into the treasury of the school. Both buildings will be ready for use by the opening of school in September 1912. This school expects to raise $200,000 for buildings and endowment by 1915. At the request of the donor, her name is withheld from the public.

The Congregationalist says: "One result of the Men and Religion Forward Movement in Des Moines has been the organization of an interchurch Sunday-school institute. The institute is under the direction of Professor Athern, head of the department of religious pedagogy of Drake University, assisted by Miss Grace Jones of Drake University, who is a member of Plymouth Church. Under the direction of the Bible study committee of the Movement this institute has been organized. A fine faculty has been selected. It is expected that from one to two hundred Sunday-school teachers will soon be enrolled. Services of the various members of the faculty are being given. Much stress is to be laid upon Sunday-school methods and the proper grading of the school. The schools of Des Moines need new methods. The School of Pedagogy at Drake University is rendering a valuable service not only to this institute, but to the Sunday-school work in the city. The Sunday-schools are being graded according to the methods of the public school, and in a few years the coursess of instruction will doubtless equal those given to the latter. The local problem in Sunday-school work is that of teachers, but fortunately many teachers in the public schools are training themselves for this religious instruction."

Notes From the Foreign Society

Chas. P. Hedges of Lotumbe, Africa, has just retured to America for his usual furlough. He has rendered splendid service on the Congo.

Miss Mary Kelly of China, who is at present on her furlough, is attending the Bible Teachers' Training School in New York City and doing some special work to better fit her for her important work in China. Her location is Nankin, the present center of the great revolution.

Kanchedi Lal, the splendid evangelist, has just moved to Sawatal, India, an important out-station. He graduated from the Jubbulpore Bible College in 1909. His wife is a trained teacher. They are efficient people and will command a large influence among their people.

Bluff City, Caldwell, Ashton, South Haven and Geula Springs, churches in Sumner county, Kansas, combine their offerings for the support of a missionary on the foreign field and thus constitute another Living-link in the Foreign Society. W. E. Zirkle, a business man in South Haven, leads in this

By Professor Herbert L. Willett

PART I, FROM MOSES TO ELISHA

This is the first of four parts, which will cover the entire field of prophetic activity in the Old Testament. In the present issue there are thirteen sections, as follows:

THE PROPHETS AND THE OLD TESTAMENT.
THE BEGINNINGS OF PROPHETIC WORK.
MOSES AND ISRAEL.
MOSES AND THE BEGINNINGS OF THE NATION.
THE RISE OF SAMUEL
SAMUEL, JUDGE AND PROPHET.
DAVID AND NATHAN.
AHIJAH OF SHILOH.
ELIJAH AND THE PROPHETS OF BAAL.
ELIJAH, DEFENDER OF POPULAR RIGHTS.
ELISHA, THE PASTOR OF ISRAEL
THE REFORMS OF ELISHA.
THE PROPHETS OF THE JUDEAN SCHOOL.

These studies and those that follow in the series have been in use in many Sunday-schools during the past year, in the weekly form in which they have appeared in The Christian Century. This first part is now thoroughly revised and published in convenient form for class work or private use.

It contains ninety-two pages, is bound in paper, and is sold at thirty-five cents the copy.

The Best

Did you know that the Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 will be in The Life of Christ? That means that you will want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition is now being prepared to meet the great demand expected this fall. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

new enterprise. R. W. Nelson, a student in Oklahoma University, Enid, seconds his efforts.

The work is progressing successfully at Jubbulpore, India. There is the greatest possible need for two buildings, one for a home and one for a dormitory for the young men in the college of the Bible. We are hoping these building will be supplied at an early date.

Dr. E. I. Osgood, chairman of the China mission, reports the building of the new hosiptal at Nantungchow progressing favorably. The rains have somewhat hindered the beginning of the work, but it is hoped it will be done by the first of January. Dr. W. E. Poland has spent much time and great care in the building of the hospital.

The demand for Mission Study text books has never been so great and never before in the history of the Foreign Society have we been able to supply this demand with such splendid material. The Endeavor Societies have entered upon a regular campaign in missionary instruction.

The Foreign Society is sending out a very interesting and instructive Endeavor Day program for the first Sunday in February. One of the special features is a letter from one of the older boys in the Damoh Orphanage. It will be remembered that the Endeavor Societies have sustained this orphanage chiefly from the beginning. There are now 240 boys in the institution.

How a Church will Spend One Hundred Thousand Dollars

Recently the Linwood Boulevard Christian Church of Kansas City came into a bequest of one hundred thousand dollars to be used as a trust fund, the income only of which can be expended by the church.

We had an indebtedness of $70,000—$20,000 of which was floating indebtedness, the other $50,000 a bond issue. On Sunday, December third, we raised $22,000 by popular subscription to pay off the floating indebtedness. We still have the $50,000 bond issue, the interest of which must still be met regularly. Fifty thousand dollars of our bequest, when we receive the money, (which will be a year or two hence) can be applied over against the $50,000 of the bond issue—that is to say, the interest of one cancelling the interest of the other, and we can, if necessary, borrow $50,000 more in similar fashion with which to enlarge our plant. Probably something of this kind will be done. We are crowded for Sunday-school space; Ladies Aid rooms; dinning rooms; entertainment rooms; and we want a roof garden for evening meetings in the summer time in the open air. All these things we think can be provided on $50,000, as we already have a seventy-five foot lot upon which to build.

Two years ago when we completed our structure, which cost us about $140,000, we had a membership of about six hundred. Today we have twelve hundred. A year from now we should have two thousand, if we do not decide to hive and swarm. All told, our own people have raised close to $100,000 for this structure, with no one very wealthy man to carry the heavy end of the burden. The church is homogeneous in character—made up almost entirely of people in moderate, though comfortable circumstances.

Yesterday's appeal was made for us by Z. T. Sweeney of Columbus, Indiana, after a two weeks series of sermons. He gave our people a thorough grounding in first principles and made the call for money yesterday in most admirable fashion.

The Divinity of Christ

is the new work on religion by EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES which bids fair to be even more generally discussed than the same author's "Psychology of Religious Experience."

It is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

Resolutions Adopted by the National Board of Christian Endeavor

Whereas, a National Board of Christian Endeavor was elected by the General Convention of the Disciples of Christ in session at Topeka, Kansas, October 11-16, 1910.

And whereas, it becomes the duty of this board to advance the interests of Christian Endeavor in every way possible among the Disciples of Christ.

And Whereas, The first Sunday in February of each year is observed among the Christian Endeavor Societies of all religious bodies as Endeavor Day, commemorating the institution of this movement and otherwise promoting the cause of Christian Endeavor.

Therefore be it resolved:

1. That all the societies among the Disciples of Christ be requested to observe the first Sunday in February as Christian Endeavor Day.

2. That this Board prepare and furnish to the societies, free of all cost, a suitable program to be used for this occasion.

3. That all the societies among our churches be requested to take an offering on that day to be used by this Board in the conduct of its work.

4. That all money raised in this, or other ways, by this Board over the amount necessary to adequately carry on the work committed to its care be divided as this Board may direct, among our National Missionary organizations.

FROM THE NATIONAL SUPERINTENDENT.

The attention of all our preachers, Endeavor societies, and leaders in the work among our young people is called to the above resolutions which were passed at a recent meeting of the National Board of Christian Endeavor for the Disciples of Christ. These resolutions were unanimously adopted after full discussion, and we believe they not only express the wishes and purpose of the body adopting them, but will meet with the general approval of our people. Christian Endeavor Day has never among us, been used for the distinct purpose of educating our young people in Christian Endeavor, and for its extension among our churches. That there is a very general desire that the day be so used, is not news to those who are in touch with the Christian Endeavor work among us. Other religious bodies make much of this celebration along the lines indicated above, and there is no doubt that this purpose was in view when the United Society of Christian Endeavor first led the societies into observing the birthday of this great movement. Acting in harmony with the resolutions, and following, as we believe, the growing desire of our young people to restore the day to its original meaning and significance, our Board has prepared a most interesting and attractive program entitled: "Christian Endeavor in All Lands," for the use in our societies. This program has been prepared by Austin Hunter of Chicago, and W. E. M. Hackleman of Indianapolis. It will be found complete in every respect. It will educate and instruct as well as entertain. It adequately sets forth the purpose and work of Christian Endeavor. The songs, both music and words, are printed in the program. We are asking all our societies to use this program on the first Sunday evening in February. They will be furnished free of all cost in such quantities as may be desired. Of course we expect that an offering be taken at the close of the meeting and forwarded to the undersiged. The money which the societies give will be expended, under the direction of our Board in extending Christian Endeavor in our churches, and doing such work as may be possible for us to do to increase the efficiency of the societies. It should be kept in mind that no money sent us is expended in salaries, except the salary of a stenographer. After the expenses which our work entails, such as the publication of literature, postage and printing, any funds remaining will be turned over to our various missionary agencies in accordance with the resolutions and under the direction of our Endeavor Board. All orders for programs should be sent at once and to the undersigned.

CLAUDE E. HILL,
National Superintendent.

Christian University, Canton, Missouri.

The recent gift of $25,000, by a philanthropic woman of St. Louis, assures us an elegant new dormitory by the opening of school next September. A St. Louis architect is preparing plans for a building to accommdoate about sixty students. The building will be steam-heated, electric-lighted and have all the modern conveniences. We need two such buildings. We ought to have a central heating plant, for economy and efficiency.

Mrs. Rowena Mason, of St. Louis, adds $5,000 to our endowment fund on the annuity plan. We offer annuities on the same basis as our other church organizations. Those interested should write me for a sample bond, stating age of applicant.

Our Board of Trustees has formally lauched a campaign to raise $200,000 in the next three and one-half years, of which $70,000 will be expended for needed buildings and the remaining $130,000 added to our permanent endowment. This will bring our productive endowment up to $200,000, giving us many advantages which we can not now have.

The future of Christian University looks brighter than for many years. In a little more than two years we have received about $102,000 from outside sources, either in cash or reliable securities. If our friends and alumni would loyally support our new campaign to a successful issue, this honored institution will be placed on a solid and permanent basis for future growth and work.

Joseph Bryan and I are planning a short team-campaign among a number of churches to present the claims of the Sunday-school and the Church College. The relation between these two institutions should be as close and vital as that which exists between the ward and high schools, or between high schools and State Universities. Cameron, Kearney, Hamilton, Wheeling, Chillicothe, Bramer, Cowgill, and Lawson are on our first intinerary.

Our students are clamoring insistently for a gymnasium, which is very much needed for their health and happiness. We shall require $25,000 to erect this building and equip it with complete apparatus, swimming-pool, shower-baths, etc. Who will make a generous gift to start it?

W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, has just made our college library a generous donation of valuable reference books. If there are other preachers who would like to make us gifts of books from their private libraries we shall gladly pay the charges. Write, Dean Henry B. Robison the list of books you can spare. an increase over the corresponding day of last year. The total for the week is $4,512.56 as compared with $2,127.51 for 1910. This is more than double. A continuation of this record will unquestionably mean "$40,000 from the Sunday-schools for American Missions." In all, 471 schools have sent offerings.

The preparatory campaign this year has been conducted with unusual vigor. Six months of earnest prayer with an intelligent presentation of some of the needs of the homeland has proven just what was necessary to enlist the co-operation of all the forces. The educational exercise has been very popular and most schools have used part of it, if not all, in their program. The class apportionment with a blackboard analysis of the offering has done every school good that tried it, and has increased the offering materially.

Those schools that for any reason did not use November 26 should use one of the remaining Sundays in December. The 24th, Christmas Eve, would be a fine time to make a generous Christmas gift that good will may prevail in all America, and Christ's name be known and honored. Supplies will be sent to all for the asking.

It is good to see how happy the workers are in the making of this offering.

ROBERT M. HOPKINS,
American Superintendent.

Good Church Extension News

The brethren everywhere will be glad to hear that for October and November of the new missionary year, the total Church Extension receipts are $23,549.65. This is a gain over the first two months of 1910 of $14,999. We gained $14,337.05 from individuals and $661.95 from the churches. There was a gain of 194 in contributing churches. There are yet many churches that promised to take the offering, that have not sent their remittances. These we hope will be sent in during the month of December.

During the month of November the Board received a $9,000 annuity from a friend in one of the western states. This makes $18,000 that he has contributed to Church Extension in the last four years. The Board received another annuity gift of $900 from a friend in Atlanta, Ga. The Board received $500 from the estate of Mrs. Ellen Green of Jacksonville, Ill., and $4,000 from the estate of Edwin S. Adams, of Cleveland, Ohio, who was a member of the Euclid Ave. Christian Church.

These special gifts have lifted the Church Extension Fund up to $918,783 on the first of December. It ought to be no trouble now to reach the million dollars in 1912. It requires only $88,000 to reach the coveted goal. Shall we not all work to this end?

When the Wesleyan Movement was started in England, John Wesley's motto was, "A church for every preacher, a preacher for every church and a house for every congregation." This motto has been well carried out by the Methodist Episcopal churches of America because of the $29,000,000 raised for Church Extension in the last fifty years, over $14,000,000, or nearly half, was raised by the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, of the 42,633 churches built by Church Extension money, 23,000 buildings were erected by the Church Extension Fund of the Methodist Church, North and South. A good motto for any religious body is, "No idle preachers, no pastorless church, and no homeless congregation."

Applications are still coming in for help, 266 churches applied for help to build in 1911 thus far. Truly we are a growing religious body.

G. W. MUCKLEY, Cor. Sec.

The Gospel of the Kingdom

For Young People's and Adult Classes

The enthusiasm with which so many adult Sunday school classes have taken up the gospel of the Kingdom series this fall prompts us to present the outline of subjects for the entire year of 1912. The lessons come in the form of a monthly magazine—not quarterly, but monthly—at 50c a year. Dr. Josiah Strong is the editor of the series. Problems relating to men, women and the home are uppermost the coming year. The magazine is adapted to both men and women, whether young people or older folks. Send 5c in stamps for a single copy of the magazine.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The Graded Lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' and Primary Departments are fully completed. Three of the four Junior grades are complete. Fourth year Junior pupils may use either third year Junior lessons or first year Intermediate. Two of the four Intermediate grades are complete, and these materials may be used for the entire Intermediate Department. For Senior and Adult Departments, Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus" is provided. Other Adult classes may use Dr. Strong's "The Gospel of the Kingdom."]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

EVERY LESSON WRITER IS A RECOGNIZED AUTHORITY IN THE INTERDENOMINATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL WORLD!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that co-operation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing. You need every one of this splendid list.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

OF PERENNIAL INTEREST TO DISCIPLES.

HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS ADVOCATING CHRISTIAN UNION

Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic literary product of the Disciples' first century of history. Thousands have been sold and the volume is enjoying a steady demand. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Barton W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Price, $1.00.

Z. T. Sweeney says:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

AN ILLUMINATING BIT OF AMERICAN CHURCH HISTORY.

THE EARLY RELATION AND SEPARATION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES

By Errett Gates, Ph. D.

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 35c.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature."—The Christian Worker.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—The Congregationalist.

A FASCINATING RELIGIOUS STORY.

ALTAR STAIRS

By Charles J. Scofield.

An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound and illustrated. Price, $1.00.

"A most excellent serial."—J. H. Garrison.
"An admirable story."—J. J. Haley.
"A most forceful and healthful piece of reading."—Z. T. Sweeney.
"If one begins this book he will not put it down until the very satisfactory end is finished."—Christian Observer.
"A strong book and worthy of unqualified endorsement."—Religious Telescope.

BOOKS BY HERBERT L. WILLETT

BASIC TRUTHS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH

Cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75c; paper, 35c.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style.

"For me the finest chapter in the book is that on the Resurrection. This gets one back into the lives of the Apostles on that Resurrection morn. It is a historical study indeed. One hears the tread of conquering hosts and the beating of the wings of twelve legions of angels."—P. C. Macfarlane.
"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

OUR PLEA FOR UNION AND THE PRESENT CRISIS

Cloth; 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50c. Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period. The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

STUDIES IN THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL

Cloth, $1.00.

One of the volumes in the Constructive Series of handbooks. It is prepared for the use of classes in secondary schools and in the secondary division of the Sunday-schools. It presents the entire material of First Samuel with explanatory notes, questions, and illustrations. It is used in a large number of Sunday-schools, in grades of the ages of eleven to fourteen.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE BOOKS

Cloth, $1.25.

An introduction to the literature of the New Testament. The book is a work of collaboration with James M. Campbell, D. D., a prominent Congregational minister, who supplies the interpretative material in connection with each of the books of the New Testament. A handbook widely used by individual students and classes.

THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF JESUS

Cloth, 35 cents.

A small handbook prepared for classes desiring to study the outline of the life of Christ, and a brief statement of the most important teachings of the Master. It is based upon the entire material of the four Gospels arranged in chronological order.

THE PROPHETS OF ISRAEL

Cloth, 35 cents.

A handbook on this, the most important theme of the Old Testament. It gives a survey of the history of prophecy in Israel from the beginning of the national life to the close of the Maccabæan age. It has been widely used in institutions of education and in Bible classes, and has passed through several editions.

THE RULING QUALITY

Board, 35 cents.

A small book of sixty pages dealing with faith as the conquering quality in human life. The theme is interwoven with comments upon the quest of the Holy Grail as illustrated in Mr. Abbey's panels.

The Best

Did you know that the Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 will be in The Life of Christ? That means that you will want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition is now being prepared to meet the great demand expected this fall. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

The Message of the Advent

IT WAS in the days when Augustus who had found Rome a city of brick was making it a city of marble that a new voice was heard upon the streets of that old world proclaiming the simple story of a Jewish peasant who had arisen among his fellow-men to proclaim an era of good will in a world of strife.

Of course few took seriously this message at the first. It was not the first time in history that dreamers had anticipated the coming of the golden age. There had always been seers and mystics who had hoped for the great enlightenment and had made themselves the prophets of the dawn.

But the mystery of this new voice was that, unlike the other harbingers of the day, it would not be hushed. Slowly the story of the Nazarene traveled along the highways of that Roman world. It was told on the hillsides of Judea, in the marts of Galilee and even in the half-heretical retreats of Samaria.

It was whispered along the shores of the Mediterranean, on the streets of Tyre and Sidon and amid the groves of Daphne at Antioch. It got itself repeated in Corinth and Ephesus and Athens, and presently even Rome itself heard the story of the Man who was sent from God.

To be sure, there were many wonderful features in the story as it was told. They said this new prophet had the mysterious power of healing the sick, cleansing the lepers, giving sight to the blind, casting out evil spirits and of raising the dead. They reported that after his death those who were his closest friends had seen him again alive, and that he had promised them to abide with them forever.

Such reports were amazing, and yet they were not the most important features of his career. Some of these things had been said of other men in history, though with varying stress. And though they aroused a certain interest, it was only of a mild and transient character, and never deeply stirred the heart of the Roman world.

But much more astonishing and convincing were the reports regarding the life, the teachings and the ideals of this wonderful Savior who delighted to call himself the Son of Man. They said of him that his life was ful of human sympathy and kindness, though he did not lack the qualities of stern and unbending severity upon occasion.

They said of him that he actually treated all men and women as his brothers and sisters, that he took them at their highest value, urged them to the achievement of the noblest character, and really convinced them that the attainment of holiness and human brotherhood was possible to them and to all.

They said that he lived a life of such dependence upon the unseen God whom he called Father, that his prayerful, reverent, and devout attitude was itself an inspiration to undertake the same quest of the inner way and the same conquest of the lesser good.

They said of him that he had such an all-embracing ideal for humanity as seemed to put upon the basis of reality the most opulent dreams of earlier ages, dreams which had been cherished but for a moment and then abandoned as nothing worth. He talked of the Kingdom of God, the realm of divine activities, not only as if it were capable of realization, but had already come in the beginnings of its power.

He gathered about himself a little company of friends whom he led gradually to see his far-reaching and world-embracing ideas, and whom he transformed in the same gradual way from selfish, irresolute and half-trained men to generous, confident and disciplined interpreters of his ideal. And the astonishing factor in the lives of these men was their departure to places both near and far, bent upon the disclosure of his message to men of every race, confident that his program would really work wherever it was attempted.

And thus on that hard pagan world there dawned the consciousness that a new and vital element had entered human life. It was seen to be true beyond all misbelieving that this Teacher of Nazareth, who had lived so convincing and inspiring a life had both by his conduct and his message made evident to his fellowmen that such companionship with God as the world had dreamed of but never hoped to attain was actually possible for all men and in every age. He had come to lift his brethren into a realm of joy and power in which he himself forever abode.

The old Greek myth of Deucalion and Pyrra affirmed that after the deluge this man and woman had repeopled the world by casting stones over their shoulders. Those thrown by Deucalion became men; those dropped by Pyrra were women. In Mr. William Vaughn Moody's impressive drama, "The Fire Bringer," Prometheus, half man and half god, devotes himself to the quickening of these poor, half-formed, stone men and earth women into real life and joy. The mighty compassion of an older brother came upon him, and he could not stay from his work of completing their half-finished lives.

Even so, Jesus, Son of God and Son of Man, felt himself implicit in the experience of humanity. Its griefs and burdens, its mistakes and superstitions he felt as a part of his own tragedy. He must bring them the fire from heaven. He must open to them the gates of life. He must show them that the meaning of humanity had never been known, and that he would make it clear by filling out to fullness the outlines of that great word.

And this message of an older Brother who had the insight to see truth and life in their largest dimensions is the story of the Advent which all the centuries have been telling. No Christmas proclamation can compass its significance. No anthems can ever sufficiently voice its majesty. It was the advent of Man into a world made for men. It is the message of the advent of humanity to its own estate made possible by that Man.

The New Labor Leader

Last week we studied the effect of the McNamara case in the labor movement. The problem of labor is the problem of leadership. Labor needs most of all a new type of leader. We must not think that this leader can be secured elsewhere than from the ranks of labor itself. The problems of labor must be made real through every day human contact with them. Yet somehow the labor leader must rise above the ranks of his brethren in intelligence and equipment or he is no real leader. May not the work of the labor leader come at last to be something like the work of the minister? Why should not a bright, intelligent carpenter be sent by his brethren to a school to study sociology and economics that he may be fitted to do the work of a real leader? The greatness of John Mitchell is that he combines the real human experiences of the every-day miner with a knowledge of books and movements. He is no mere man of the pick nor on the other hand is he a mere man of theories. He has been produced by a natural process. The process that produced him is not producing enough like him. Why might not the labor union observe the value of such men and actually educate and prepare its own leaders just as the church sends away its young men to prepare for the service of the religious community? The new labor leader must be a man who works not only for laboring men but for the whole community, since the welfare of each is bound up with the welfare of all. The ideal labor leader will have large human sympathies, he will know when to fight and when to speak softly; he will above all things recognize that men are brothers and partners, and that even the employer may have human rights. We shall hail the day when the new labor leader shall be in every case a Christian. It will mean the introduction into the labor movement of just that set of ideal influences of which it has stood in need so much during the passing years.

The Social Evil and Politics

The financing of the corrupt political rings of a city through the revenue of the underworld was once a scandalous charge that the American people were not ready to bring against even their worst leaders. Now no one questions the unholy alliance. Mayor Harrison is just now engaged in a laudable effort to clean up the police force of Chicago. Since we are sometimes called upon to criticise his honor we should be none the less generous in our praise of this good move, for it seems the real thing at last. We are told that Mrs. Harrison, who is a social student, is deeply interested in this move of the mayor. The method of the corrupt forces is a simple one. There are upon the statute book many laws which are not enforcible under city conditions. There are other laws which are enforcible, but which public opinion will allow to be violated without too much protest. The violation of these laws is the condition that makes it possible for the underworld to greatly increase its revenue. The underworld can easily afford to pay tribute money to the proper political powers in order that it shall not be molested. The social evil, yielding an income in Chicago of $15,000,000, can easily furnish political funds which will buy in politics anything which money can buy. It has been thus that an evil ring has perpetuated itself in many of the cities of the country. It is the money power which has made our municipal politics a stench in the nostrils of the civilized world. We shall have no permanent reforms in municipal politics until this unholy alliance is permanently dissolved. The low saloon and the dive require the political ring for their existence. The interests of the church and the kingdom demand that the war on corrupt politics shall be carried to the spot where the heart of the whole system beats.

The Christmas Campaign Against Tuberculosis

It is at this time of year that the Christmas stamps are sold to provide funds for the war against tuberculosis. So widespread is the interest and co-operation that the representatives of this good cause are now permitted to do their work even in government buildings and department stores where any ordinary cause would be barred. It should be impossible for any good Christian to enjoy Christmas time without participating in this great movement. The funds that are provided are used in a number of ways. We are realizing that the first step in the war against tuberculosis is education. Even poor families have the resources for dealing with this dread disease in many cases but fail to employ them through ignorance. This ignorance is often shared by those in homes of wealth. The simple remedies of open air day and night, specially nourishing food, freedom from excessive fatigue, and the observance of the ordinary hygienic precautions have cured many a case of tuberculosis that was not too far advanced. The care of the sputum and the burning of all polluted cloths has kept the dread disease from spreading in the family where the patient lives. The strongest member of the family should be the nurse. Tuberculosis is not to be quarantined, but the comparative isolation of the patient from weaker members of the household is always advisable. Many old and exploded notions about the treatment of this disease need still to be met. It is not necessary usually to change climate. The doctor who advises it often wishes to have the responsibility for the death of the patient to fall upon some one else. The sanatoria for the care and cure of tuberculous patients are not located in any particular section of the country. Their good work is going on in every kind of climate. The Christmas fund that we accumulate will help to bring to sufferers from this dread disease the detailed information they need and will help on the movement for sanatoria where the patients can be cared for away from home and in a place that does not endanger the rest of the family.

The Social Note in Missions

The laymen's movements of recent times have disclosed that the best men of our country are interested in missions. That there has been a great change of front on the missionary subject none can dispute. Perhaps a muck-raking magazine may still venture to bring a railing accusation against the missionary forces throughout the world but no one any longer takes this seriously. Why has the country at large, as well as the church, taken this advanced ground on missions? Why do men that are not members of the church often contribute to missions? It is the change of front in our missionary propaganda. Once we sent missionaries to the foreign field to snatch dying souls from hell. It was once a favorite argument to compute how many souls went into hell every minute without the benefits of a blood atonement. We talk missions altogether differently now. The most orthodox of people speak of the "investment" in missions. Perhaps the phrase is a commercial one and must pass out for a still better terminology, but the significance of it is that we now believe that missionary money buys more that is significant to civilization and human happiness than perhaps anything we spend. We now have schools, hospitals, dispensaries and many other "institutional church" devices upon the foreign field. We are far more modern in our methods in China that we are in the United States. We draw no unholy antithesis between "religion" and sociology on the foreign field. We find in our foreign mission work that the parable of the Good Samaritan is in the same gospel with the parable of the Prodigal Son, though we sometimes forget this in home missions. As electricity must have its wire in order to be useful to humanity, so religion must have its social program or it is no more serviceable than is the diffused force of the aurora borealis. Missions has united the practical and the ideal, it has married philanthropy to mysticism and we have the powerful religion of the mission field.

Four Great Causes of Poverty

Poverty has been the curse of the world since the dawn of civilization. Once property was communal and poverty was not an individual matter. With the introduction of private property came the differences that have resulted from the various causes. Poverty is one of the greatest evils in the world. Many of our social troubles flow from this root trouble of the present order of things. In an age so ingenious in other things, it seems we might invent a remedy for poverty. The causes of poverty when thoroughly discovered will point the way to the remedy. The first great cause is ignorance. We are trying to dissipate that cause through education, but education has often been but little concerned about the root necessity of life, to have food. Men that have been literate have yet failed in "practical" life. They have even been college graduates and yet have failed to make the practical adjustments to life whereby they would be comfortable. A second great cause is a bad economic order. The greed of commercial interests taking advantage of the ignorance and weakness of men has established industrial standards that keep men on the brink of poverty in their most productive period and leave them stranded and to be kept at public expense in their old age. Labor unions have fought for better conditions, but until some of these matters receive governmental regulation, we shall still have the problem of the desperately poor. A third cause is vicious habits. The moral element enters into all of life. The tremendous income from the sale of liquor is drawn from the pockets of the hand-workers far more than from the resources of employers and brain-workers. The money spent in this country for habit-producing drugs, such as nicotine and caffein, is a serious economic problem. A fourth cause is sickness. This is often due to bad health conditions at the place of employment.

A Step Toward Church Union

A first step toward union between the Presbyterian and Reformed Churches, the latter the Dutch, and not the German branch, was taken in New York last week. The promotor, Rev. Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, a young Presbyterian pastor who comes from the famous Sloane family of New York, said there has been much talk about unity and he thought it time somebody made a start towards it. Presbyterian and Reformed communions have precisely the same form of government, and almost the same confessions—the Westminster and the Heidelberg. If they cannot unite, the young leader wondered what two bodies could do so.

The action proposed thus far does not contemplate organic union, nor does it mention federation. It simply proposes co-operative work, with the thought that it may lead to actual and complete union some day. The work is Church extension in New York suburbs, united adjustment of existing fields in Manhattan, and possible common work in public institutions. Only one presbytery and one classic are involved. Members of these bodies have just held a union meeting, the first in their long histories. The sentiment was cordial, and plans of work as outlined were unanimously agreed upon.

The Presbyterian body involved is the large northern one, with 1,500,000 communicants. The Reformed Church is that which, coming from Holland not long after the Pilgrims came from England by the way of Holland, settled New York and founded the first Church there. The Church is still in existence, with a Fifth Avenue place of worship, and is a part of the great Collegiate Reformed corporation. There are Reformed Churches in others parts of New York, in New Jersey, and in a few other states, but most in Michigan. The total membership is about 140,000 in the whole country.

Baptists Exerting Their Strength

Rev. Dr. Robert S. MacArthur of New York has just sailed for Russia on a mission unlike any which an American citizen, certainly an American preacher ever entered upon. He is the new president of the Baptist World Alliance, and in a real sense represents Christian people by the hundreds of thousands, even millions, as might be possible in no other religious body. His mission is first to Russia, but it is even broader than that. He goes bearing letters to world rulers from President Taft, and letters from Secretary of State Knox to Ambassadors in all countres in Europe and Asia which he expects to visit.

The Allliance president's mission to Russia is to ask the Czar and the Russian government for a larger measure of religious liberty for all peoples of all faiths within his vast empire. He will present, he says, a written statement and will back it up with an oral one in case he is permitted to do so. He is famous throughout the Roman Catholic Church in America for having preached and spoken many things against it. He says that now, however, he will ask the Czar for larger liberty for Roman Catholics in Russia, of which there are many thousands, and especially for better treatment of Jews.

Just before sailing President MacArthur admitted that his mission in Russia is a difficult one. "New England Puritans have treated Baptists as badly as ever Russians treated Jews," he observed, "and I suspect the Czar of all the Russians knows it. The American people have been cruel to the American negro, and I suspect the Czar knows that too. We exclude the Chinese, and I am sure that all Russia knows that, and knows how unjust we are in this respect. Nevertheless, I believe that with full confession for American failings on my part, I may be able to accomplish something on Russia's part."

Dr. MacArthur has succeeded in raising from American Baptists a considerable sum of money with which to complete a Baptist Church in St. Petersburg. He will assist in this Church's dedication there, and will visit Moscow, where are other Baptist churches. He will not visit Rome, where there is a considerable Baptist membership, but will go to some other European centres, where Baptist strength has much increased of late. Then he will continue around the world, visiting especially Baptist missions in Burma, where foreign missions from America had one important start, and finally, reaching San Francisco, he will inspect home mission work on the Coast and in the Rocky mountain states.

The world trip, lasting a year, means more than an expression of Baptist strength, it is said. It means a centralization of Baptist power such as is quite foreign to old Baptist ideas, which are congregational. It means also, it is claimed, wielding of a Christian force for world betterment in a way and in a strength greater than has ever been exercised before.

Reorganizing Congregationalism

Organic changes of very far reaching import are proposed by Congregationalists. The changes are outlined in a report made by nineteen representative men, appointed a Commission on Polity by the National Council one year ago in Boston, and instructed to report two years hence to the Council to meet in Kansas City. On the Commission are the moderator of the Council, Rev. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, the president of the American Board, Hon. Samuel B. Capen; the chairman of the International Committee Y. M. C. A., Dr. Lucien C. Warner; and leaders of like grade, among them Rev. Dr. Henry A. Stimson, Rev. Dr. Rockwell H. Potter, Rev. Dr. William E. Barton, Prof. Frank K. Sanders and Prof. Williston Walker.

The trend of the report is in favor of a complete reorganization of American Congregationalism, and greatly to centralize it. It is claimed, however, that Congregational traditions are not violated in any marked degree. The legislative power and the representative character are introduced. The National Council, a volunteer body, becomes much more an official one. It is to sit every other instead of every third year, and through its nomination of fixed proportions of managers of missionary societies it is in effect to come into control of all Congregational benevolences.

The American Board, the oldest of American missionary societies, is continued for foreign work, subject to control as just outlined, but for home work there is proposed a Home Board of Missions into which all existing home benevolent organizations are either merged or to which control is surrendered. Several of these organizations are comparatively small, like Education, Church Building, Ministerial Relief and Publishing, but two well known societies, both home, form the basis of the proposed Home Board. These are the present Home and the American Missionary. The former celebrated its diamond jubilee a few years ago. It grew out of a society formed in early days in Connecticut, and has had much to do with the planting of Congregational Churches throughout the West. The American Missionary Association grew out of Civil War controversies and times, and has had to do with Fisk University and similar educational institutions in the South, with Indian and Esquimaux work, and later with Porto Ricans.

The report of the Commission has just been made public. It has not been adopted, and its features are put forth at this time in order that ministers' associations, congregations, and members may study it. If a vote were to be taken at this time it is said to be likely that some amendments would be proposed, but as the vote is two years in future, the prediction is made that by that time its approval will be unanimous. The aims are decrease of administrative expense of benevolences, and closer co-operation of all general agencies. As a step toward the latter aim, the same Commission report proposes to magnify greatly the office of secretary of the National Council. So marked is the change that the secretary, if on the foundation now suggested, will virtually be at the head of the denomination in even larger degree, and with rather more powers, than the presiding bishop in the Episcopal Church, or the moderator of the General Assembly in the Presbyterian. The report recommends that the Council secretary be selected and set to work as soon as possible. The suggestions are among the most radical ever made by any religious body in what may be called a time of peace; that is, when there was upon it no stress of doctrinal dispute or division.

The Conclusion of the Whole Matter

Have we employed our time in the most profitable way during the year that is closing? Are we more intelligent and courageous than we were a year ago? Have we been lovers of pleasure more than lovers of the God of truth and justice? Have we given up the ideals that once gave meaning to life and have we allowed our work to become drudgery? Have we tried to make any contribution to the strength of the church, the school, and the state? Have we lived with and for others or have we uniformly thought of others as means to our private ends? Few of us know ourselves well enough to give entirely satisfactory answers to these questions. The one whose aims have been the narrowest is apt to answer promptly that he has met all his obligations in a generous spirit. The generous man knows that he has probably overlooked some important obligation.

The man who is ready to say he would change nothing in the experience of the past year will not come to the prayer-meeting to give us the benefit of his wisdom. Those who come will wish that some things had been different. Their confidence has been betrayed, the forces of evil have triumphed, friends have been slow to appreciate the significance of spiritual movements. It will remove a great burden from our shoulders if we fix it firmly in our minds that we are not running the universe. We have a part in its work. If we have neglected to do our duty, we ought to be discontented. Watchfulness must not become worry that hinders efficiency. If the proper conclusion of the whole matter is to fear God and keep his commandments, it must be true that God can be trusted to manage the universe.

That a life of pleasure-seeking is unsatisfying is well known even to those who follow pleasure as the chief good. They may or may not have visions of a more worthy existence. If they identify the chief good with pleasures that weaken their own intelligence and bring to others shame and misery, they will conclude, if they have any capacity for thought, that all is vanity and a striving after wind. The logic of experience forces them to this confession.

The search for knowledge may be just as selfish as the search for pleasures. The aristocracy of intellect is a hindrance to happiness. The world has never been overstocked with intelligence. It needs much more than it now has. But the man who sets himself apart from the rest of his kind, or from all but a few elect minds, and indulges in contemptuous sneers at the stupidity of the average man, will come to the conclusion that life is hardly worth living, if he has half as much sense as he thinks he has.

Another delusion is cherished by the religious formalist. He separates religion from common experience. His God is one that can be appeased by prayers and gifts and refrains from interfering with the private and political acts of his worshipers. The worshiper may rob a neighbor of his land, drive women and children from their homes, enjoy luxury at the price of the life-blood of his countrymen, and yet feel no entrangement from his God so long as he is liberal in his offerings and careful in observing to the letter the ritual of the sanctuary. The kind of honesty of which he boasts is that of keeping the rules of the game, not of dealing with human beings as human beings.

The conclusion of the whole matter as seen by a modern scientist is given in the following words of Professor Huxley: "In the eighth century B. C., in the heart of a world of idolatrous polytheists, the Hebrew prophets put forth a conception of religion which appears to be as wonderful an inspiration of genius as the art of Phidias or the science of Aristotle. 'And what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God!' If any so-called religion takes away from this great saying of Micah, I think it wantonly mutilates, while if it adds thereto I think it obscures, the perfect ideal of religion. But what extent of knowledge, what acuteness of scientific criticism, can touch this, if any one possessed of knowledge and acuteness could be absurd enough to make the attempt? Will progress of research prove justice worthless and mercy hateful; will it ever soften the bitter contrast between our actions and our aspirations; or show us the bounds of the universe and bid us say, 'Go to, now we comprehend the infinite?'" More valuable to the Christian than the words of the scientist is the testimony of his own heart that it is life to declare the love of God through service to man. [Midweek service, Dec. 27. The Meaning of Baptism

In the last article we found that the attitude of John the Baptist toward the religious leaders of his day and their attitude toward his baptism threw an interpreting side-light upon the meaning of the ordinance. It was clear that the meaning of baptism did not inhere in the specific physical act of immersion by which it was solemnized. Nor was it a merely individualistic expression of repentance. It was rather an act whereby the penitent individual allied himself with a social order of penitent men in an endeavor to practice the ideals of right-doing which their prophet-leader enjoined. It was through baptism, with the organized community to which it pointed, that John proposed to conserve the results of his ministry. By means of it the repentance and moral decision which his preaching produced were objectified, socialized, carried out of the private closet of subjective experience into the open world of public control.

John was not content with being a mere voice, quickening men to repentance and moral aspiration. He well enough knew how easily these subjective states are dissipated unless they are embodied in a social fellowship of like-minded men. Hence he commanded baptism. He was not simply a preacher; he was an organizer of a movement. He quickened men to repentance, but he also commanded them to come out publicly and join the pre-messianic order of penitent men which he was inaugurating.

This coming out publicly and joining was baptism. Baptism was the single word which covered the whole initiatory act—its social aspect of induction and its individual aspect of self-commitment; its essential psychical or spiritual content and the incidental physical form by which the act was solemnized. It was this organizational character of John's work which got him the name of the "Baptist." John, the people perceived, was the founder of a pre-messianic movement and he made it his business to initiate men into it, that is, to baptize them. Therefore they called him the Baptist.

The fact that initiation into his movement was signalized by immersion was purely incidental, customary. If he had adopted some other form of initiation beside immersion he would have been compelled to step aside from his main purpose of urging repentance as the prime prerequisite of fellowship in the new brotherhood in order to explain why he had chosen his novel form. The form of immersion was already in use. It meant to the people in its customary use in initiating proselytes precisely what John wanted it to mean in his use of it—it was the outward mark and seal of the conferment of a new religious status. But the baptism was not the immersion; it was the conferment of the status, the initiation into the new order.

As we indicated in the last article, it was in this large social and religious connotation that Jesus used the word when he asked the Pharisees whether the baptism of John was from Heaven or of men. We cannot imagine Jesus concerning himself with a question so typically pharisaic as to ask whether the physical act of immersion was from heaven or of men! Nor can we imagine him diverting the minds of his hearers from the great moral issues his presence was raising to accuse them of not having been immersed in water at the hands of John. Besides, John had not claimed divine authority for immersion, any more than for the garment of camel's hair that he wore. He had claimed divine authority for his mission, his movement, and therefore for his baptism, but the particular physical act of immersion by which he signalized baptism seems not to have become a matter of consciousness either to himself or to the people.. Jesus' question to the Pharisees was a moral question. It cut through their whole system of religious pretension and made them face again the facts of conscience with which John had confronted them over three years before.

By the baptism of John, Jesus plainly meant John's enterprise, his ministry, his movement, the new order of repentant souls which he had sought to establish as a spiritual preparation for Messiah's coming. The enterprise of John, was it from heaven or of men? Was John's work divinely planned or was it a mere human project? Was his order of penitent men an inspiration of God or was it the vagary of a fanatic? This is the question Jesus put to the Pharisees under the single category of "baptism." It discloses the breadth and content of the word.

And the Pharisees understood it precisely as Jesus meant it. In preparing their answer they did not reason concerning John's authority for practicing immersion, they reasoned concerning the authority for his ministry, his enterprise. And one side of their predicament was, as they clearly saw, that if they said John's authority was from heaven, Jesus would ask them, why, then, had they not believed in him? They did not seem to fear that he would ask why they had not been immersed!

It is perfectly clear that the point at which the Pharisees reacted against the mission of John was where his enterprise cut across the pretensions of their aristocratic religious order. If John had stood within that order, if he had acknowledged the authority of its traditions, the validity of its claims to the divine promise, his message of repentance and righteousness would have been not wholly unacceptable to the leaders of the church. He then would have spoken in comparative or relative terms. He would have said, "Yes, Messiah is to come of the seed of Abraham. You who are the children of Abraham are peculiarly the custodians of the divine promise. But even to you he will not come without repentance and right doing. Come let us turn from our evil ways and let us serve God in righteousness!"

In these comparative terms John might have spoken. But he did not. He spoke in absolute terms. He stood outside their order and condemned it as a deceptive fiction. The son of a priest, he had reacted against the whole system of formalism and had spent many ascetic years in the wilderness.

As he appears on Jordan's bank the whole dramatic setting makes it plain that he approaches the Jewish church as an outsider. At no time does he seek to establish points of identification with the church. He makes no allusion to his having sprung from priestly loins. He is an out-and-out iconoclast. He does not undertake to repair the old Judaism. He is no tinkering compromiser. He believes that the old order has grown up upon a fiction. He lays the axe at the root of the tree, and predicts that Messiah when he comes will even more drastically than himself complete the work of reformation.

The Judaism of John's day was a messianic religious order, hereditary in its determining principle. But John said that the true messianic order must be moral, spiritual, not hereditary. It must be an order of penitent men seeking righteousness, not an order of blue-blooded aristocracy. God's children are not determised by heredity, he said. The true children of Abraham are not those in whose veins his blood runs but those in whose souls his faith dwells. God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham!

And so, to set his movement in the attitude of directly challenging the existing order he appropriated the baptism belonging to that existing order. This baptism was the gateway through which converts to the Jewish messianic order entered it. What John took was not simply the physical act of immersion, but the social and religious meaning of which the physical act was a sign and token. His baptism meant the same for his order of penitent men as the rite meant for the Jewish messianic community.

It is no marvel, then, that the church leaders refused to accept John. At the first it seems that they were disposed to accept him. Matthew tells us that John saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees coming "to receive his baptism." They misapprehended its meaning. They may have thought that it was merely a ceremonial washing which John was administering. That sort of a bath was to them a religious delight. They were perfectly willing to be immersed. They were not unwilling to repent. But John quickly undeceived them. He was not interested in immersing them in water. He was not interested, either, in their repentance, regarded simply as a subjective, individualistic state of mind. He was interested in an order of penitent men.

Do not come to me thinking within yourselves that Abraham is your father, he said. This baptism of mine is not a ceremony of purification for those who already belong to the messianic order it is an initiation into the true messianic order. It is not just a sacrament of your church; it is the initiating ceremony into the true church. To receive my baptism is not an act which comes under the sanctions of your traditions; it is an act destructive of your traditions. My order of penitent men is not a movement within your hereditary Judaism but a movement opposed to it. To receive my baptism is therefore to acknowledge the invalidity of your present status before God and humbly to accept membership in the order of penitent men as the true preparation for Messiah's appearing.

When the Pharisees and Sadducees opened their eyes to this meaning of John's baptism they saw that he had carried off bodily the gate of their messianic order and hung it at the entrance of his messianic order, leaving them as a result altogether outside the gate! His baptism disfranchised every man of them! It excommunicated the church! No wonder they refused his baptism and hated him! Through that gate they too must go. They must be inducted into the true messianic order. They the converters of prosyletes must themselves be converted. They the children of Abraham must take their places on a level of spiritual freemasonry with publicans, social outcasts and Gentile soldiers. They must yield their proud fiction of hereditary status and accept the moral status of penitence and right-doing.

Too often the happiness of home life is marred by thoughtless, unkind words. May it never be said of us:

"We have careful thought for the stranger,
And smiles for the sometime guest,
But oft for our own the bitter tone,
Though we love our own the best.
Ah, lip with the curve impatient,
Ah, brow with the shade of scorn,
'Twere a cruel fate were the night too late
To undo the work of morn."

A woman whom you can trust with your inmost secrets and who will not betray you, and as a wife will help you in your plans and air castles for the future, give you sympathy, love, inspiration, and advice when the world and all mankind is harsh and overbearing toward you and seems to have a grudge. A wife who will smooth the road for you when adversity strikes the hardest is indeed an angel. And you as her protector should return that love and faithfulness to its fullest extent. Make the cup of love overrun. A man should remember that his wife craves for his love and sympathy.—Selected.

O plaintive, restless heart, be still, be still!
Know that is thy Father's will
Thou here shouldst stay,
And the full measure of his purpose fill,
Though others stray.

Thy life is his appoiting. He doth know
The cares that press, yearnings that glow
Within thy breast:
Thy lot is low, but he meant it so;
Then be at rest!

"The small girl had attempted, during her mother's absence, to surprise that lady by putting the shelves of the fruit cupboard in order, and found that her enterprise ended in wreck and disaster, wrote mournfully in her diary: 'Resolved, to be just common good after this.' There really is no substitute for just common goodness. All the extra flights, the spasms of enthusiastic effort, the flurry of special undertakings and causes cannot take the place of steady, everyday faithfulness to duty. The spectacular achievement may win the applause of observers, but it is the quiet fidelity to commonplace tasks along common ways that counts for most in the end."

Professor Taylor's New Book

Professor Taylor of the Bible College of Missouri has rendered a valuable service to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and to the cause of missions by his recently published book. The average person needs correction of a common impression that missionary work consists almost entirely in the evangelization of the heathen by revival or preaching efforts. The practical man of the modern world is perhaps less interested in this phase of Christianity than almost any other. But if he can be confronted by the work which the Christian missionary is accomplishing in the education of ignorant or partially instructed nations, the preparation of medical, surgical and hospital facilities for the relief of suffering, the creation of industrial agencies for the improvement of business and craftsmanship, and the reorganization of the home upon principles of Christian morality, he will perceive the far-reaching character of the modern missionary propaganda.

This side of things has been too little interpreted in the literature of missions. Mr. Taylor's wide acquaintance with the facts of the social revival in our generation makes him an admirable interpreter of this feature of missionary work. The six chapters of the book deal with such features as the home, medical and benevolent work on the mission fields, education, the political influence of missions, and the social approach in foreign lands. The treatment is by no means confined to the work of the Disciples, yet this is featured in a way to bring home to all members of our own churches the large share which our missionaries are having in the social regeneration of foreign lands. Mr. Taylor writes in an interesting and convincing style. He is well acquainted with his facts. The book is rendered more interesting by many photographic illustrations taken from the mission fields. In addition there is a competent bibliography and in an appendix a list of questions provides material for class-room discussion.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society has placed this book absolutely within the reach of all by selling it at actual cost. The purpose is not the securing of profit but the dissemination of intelligence. It would be a blessing in any church to have sufficient copies distributed so that every member might read the book.

China Sets United States An Example

The plague of the opium habit has afflicted China for a century. It was recognized as the greatest enemy of the future of China that could be found. At first the drug was imported from India, but the poppy came to be raised at home, so there was a double source of supply. The inhuman treaty thrust upon China by Great Britain demanded entry for the drug from India. A few years ago a policy was adopted. The drug was to be exterminated from China in ten years. The poppy fields were to be progressively diminished in spite of the economic questions involved. Government officials addicted to the habit were to be dismissed. Only a few more years remain to complete the reformation of China with reference to this terrible plague. Unless the reform is interrupted by the present revolution, another five years will see China freed from bondage to opium. In our country, we have a drug habit none the less dangerous to civilization than the dread opium habit. It is worse than opium in that it is a powerful promoter of crime as well as a cause of dire poverty. We have wondered how a ten-year reduction policy would work in this country? Could we dismiss public servants who are addicted to the drug habit as they do in China? Perhaps our republican forms of social control would not permit us to undertake all they are undertaking there. Yet it is a scandal that can be removed, to take away those leaders who are drug-fiends for alcohol. We once witnesed the disgrace of a free electorate selecting a man who a few months before had rolled out of the judge's bench dead drunk, to be their representative in Congress. Surely this is not one of the evidences that our civilization is superior to that of China.

The Mission Travel Study Class

The correspondence regarding the Mission Travel Study Class, to be conducted next year by Professor Willett under the direction of the University of Chicago, indicates that there is a wide-spread interest in some such plan of study and travel. Many inquiries have come in regarding the probability of visiting China a year from this time. The plans will go forward consistently with full expectation that by that time conditions will have quieted beyond the point of any danger. More than this, it will be a period of immense interest considering the reconstruction of the country under the forces of reform and democracy. One of the former classes was in Constantinople at the very moment when the revolution was at its height. The members of that class counted it one of their greatest privileges to observe the events of that crisis at close range.

It will be remembered that the class starts early in September of next year and journeys westward from the Pacific coast, stopping at Honolulu, spending a month in Japan, a month and a half in China, a similar period in India, with a probable journey to the Philippine Islands provided the steamer sailings are satisfactory, and will finish its work with the customary class studies in Egypt and Palestine.

The class will consist of both ladies and gentlemen and the number will be limited, if possible, to fifteen. It is hoped that the results will be not only of great value to the members of the class in the careful study of the history, religions and missionary opportunities of Asiatic lands, but will afford opportunity for direct contributions to the mission work in the form of institutes and lectures to be given by the leader and members of the class. A preliminary course of study covering in general the features of the work is prepared for members of the class to pursue in the months preceding the journey. Circulars of information may be secured by addressing Professor Willett at the University of Chicago.

We are slowly learning that social advance depends quite as much upon an increase in moral sensibility as it does upon a sense of duty, and of this one could cite many illustrations. I was at one time chairman of the Child Labor Committee in the General Federation of Woman's Clubs, which sent out a schedule asking each club in the United States to report as nearly as possible all the working children under fourteen living in its vicinity.

A Florida club filled out the schedule with an astonishing number of Cuban children, who were at work in sugar mills, and the club members registered a complaint that our committee had sent the schedule too late, for if they had realized the conditions earlier, they might have presented a bill to the legislature which had now adjourned. Of course the children had been working in the sugar mills for years, and had probably gone back and forth under the very eyes of the club women; but the women had never seen them, much less felt any obligation to protect them, until they joined a club.—Jane Addams.

No matter how full a reservoir of maxims one may possess, and no matter how good one's sentiments may be, if one has not taken advantage of every concrete opportunity to act, one's character may remain entirely unaffected for the better. Every time a resolve or a fine glow of feeling evaporates without bearing practical fruit it is worse than a chance lost; it works so as positively to hinder future resolutions and emotions from taking the normal path of discharge.—Wiliam James.

We ought to be ashamed of being careful for riches, how we may acquire them in greatest abundance, and for glory and honor, but care not nor take thought for wisdom and truth, and for our souls, how they may be made most perfect.—Socrates.

He who is plenteously provided for from within, needs but little from without.—Goethe.

I Am Still My Mother's Boy

Sometimes in the hush of the evening hour,
When the shadows creep from the west,
I think of the twilight songs you sang
And the boy you lulled to rest.
The wee little boy with curls on his head
That so long ago was thine,
I wonder if sometimes you long for that boy—
You dear old mother of mine:

And now he's come to man's estate,
Grown sound in body and strong,
And you'd hardly know that he was the lad
Whom you lulled with your slumber song.
The years have altered the form and the life,
But his heart is unchanged by time—
And I'm still your only boy as of old—
"You dear old mother of mine."

A Big Revival Two and a Half Years After

Analysis and Estimate of Results of a Typical Evangelistic Enterprise

BY HUGH T. MORRISON, M. D.

EDITORS' NOTE: In the spring of 1909, The Christian Century made a feature of reporting the "Billy" Sunday revival, then being held in Springfield, Ill. Our purpose was to present impartially, even sympathetically, the facts concerning this meeting as a typical case, to afford a background for an earnest examination of modern revivalistic procedure. The weekly reports of Mr. Sunday's meeting were, therefore, followed by a series of critiques of the successful revival tending to point out the perils, illusions and possible harm in such meetings. The Springfield meeting was one of Mr. Sunday's greatest successes. There were close to 5,000 "conversions" and an offering for the evangelist of $11,000. Some months ago the united ministers' association asked Dr. H. T. Morrison, a physician, to make for that body a Survey of religious conditions in Springfield. The members of the association co-operated with him in every way to put him in possession of the actual facts of the church life of the city. A portion of these facts were given to our readers last week. A section of Dr. Morrison's voluminous report deals directly with the effect of the great revival. This section we believe to be the most remarkable analysis of a concrete revivalistic situation which has ever been given to the public. Whether the city of Springfield is typical or exceptional we do not pronounce. But that the facts disclose the illusory character of much of the benefit felt to accrue from the great revival is undeniable. The facts in regard to this one city suggest that the present evangelistic method prevailing throughout the church is in need of drastic reformation.

A consideration of Springfield's religious condition today can hardly be made without a more or less extended reference to the great religious revival of two and one-half years ago. No single event in the history of the city's religious life during the last quarter of a century bulks so large in the minds of the people. It is the date from which all our later church happenings are reckoned. We calculate the date of all events as either before or after the Sunday meeting. It is to our churches and religious experience a focal point, and serves our church calendar a purpose analogous to that served by the flood at Galveston, the earthquake at San Francisco, and the great fire in Chicago. No political or commercial event ever so stirred the city. I want to speak fairly about the meeting, and yet I want to state what seems to me the truth. The popular judgment is rendered solely on the basis of the good accomplished, but this yields a one-sided, fallacious estimate. It is not enough that we are able to point to specific instances of good that has been accomplished. We must ask as well whether any harm has been done by the meeting. It is hardly likely that an enterprise engaging the united Christian forces of a community could be carried on without accomplishing some good. But allowing for this, it may still be true that the enterprise is organized on mistaken lines and in its total, larger effect may be productive of actual harm.

Look at Both Sides.

I wish us to look this morning at both sides of the revival. It cost us twenty thousand dollars. There were reported between four and five thousand conversions. The membership of our churches was increased from twenty-five to fifty per cent. Crowds of from five to eight thousand people were addressed nightly and three times on Sunday for a period of six weeks. Hundreds, perhaps thousands of people went to the tabernacle who never go to church. The nickelodeons and theatres were temporarily almost abandoned. The meeting was the common topic of conversation on the street, in the office, in the store, at the fireside, and in the social circle. Temporarily, it displaced the weather as a topic of conversation. Two and one half years have now passed since the meeting was closed, and every leader and student of religion in the community is intensely interested to know what permanent effect has been produced by such an organized effort of the religious forces of the city.

Favorable Results

We may first look at certain results which are obviously beneficial:

First—In some of the churches, perhaps in all, there are some converts who are remaining faithful to their vows. Some of these were actual converts of the revival, and others were the indirect result of the extraordinary religious wave. In a few instances these converts have not only remained faithful, but have come to take a place among the most reliable and active of the church's membership.

Second—A number of Bible classes organized during the meeting have been perpetuated throughout the succeeding period, and several of these, to my knowledge, have been carrying forward a creditable and wholesome Bible study. I may note in this connection, that these classes, so far as I have been able to discover, are made up almost entirely of older church members, rather than the Sunday converts. Among the entire seventeen classes, only three have any Sunday converts, and two of these have but a single member each.

Third—The Y. W. C. A. and the Washington Street Mission are direct outgrowths from the revival. As to the efficiency of the latter, no word of mine need be spoken. As to the Y. W. C. A., it is only just to the citizens of Springfield to relate that among the church women a movement was on foot many months before the revival began, looking toward the starting of such an organization. The same was temporarily abandoned, the occasion seeming inappropriate at that time for its initiation. This fact is not recorded, however, to discredit the revival.

Religion Not Measured by Statistics.

I wish to deal in utmost fairness in reckoning up the positive benefit of the revival meeting. If more is to be said to its credit, I am perfectly unaware of what it may be.

I well know that religious work is not for a moment to be judged in terms of objective numerical or institutional results. And the fact that in my catalogue of beneficial effects I do not include those less tangible, less overt values, which, in religious work, are always most important, is simply due to the absence of such values from the permanent effects of this revival. When we ask such questions as: Has the quality of religious life in the churches been improved? or, Has the efficiency of the churches as instruments of the Kingdom of God been increased? or, Has the prestige, the dignity, the supreme claim of religion, been strengthened in the mind of the community as a whole?—when we ask such questions as these, my own intimate observations as well as the facts returned to me by my questionnaire, compel me to answer, no.

The fact is that in these matters of the spiritual life and the Kingdom of God—which are, after all, so much more the affairs of the community as such than we usually conceive—the revival was probably a positive harm. To say this, however, is to anticipate the third division of this analysis. And before I come to that I wish to consider the respects in which the revival was a disappointment. I am organizing my data, it will thus be seen, under three headings, (1) the benefits, (2) the disappointments, (3) the positive harm. I have already pointed out the benefits, and pass now to consider the disappointments of the revival.

The Disappointments

I. THE STATE OF THE CHURCH.

We are disappointed in the failure of the revival to appreciably strengthen the church in numbers and efficiency. A superficial observer would first notice the attendance at church services. Immediately after the close of the revival every church in the city was crowded. Long unused galleries were pressed into service, and then people could hardly be accommodated. Allowing for a good sized slump, we had good reason to expect a very large net gain in numbers. But the data gathered by our questionnaire reveals that congregations, with a possible exception or two, have been reduced to the same point at which they stood before the revival. Some are even smaller than before. The enrolled membership is greatly in advance of two and a half years ago, but there is shown an appalling disparity between the active membership and this enrollment. The total active membership is not appreciably greater than before the revival. The prayer-meetings are attended apparently by the same few who were faithful before, with perhaps enough additions to balance those dropping out. The Sunday-schools show no advance. Some of the larger schools are considerably smaller, and others of the largest are standing in attendance practically at the same figure as two and one half years ago, but none of the larger schools show an increase, with perhaps one exception. Some of the smaller schools have increased, some have lost, and some have remained unchanged. If any change in the combined schools of the city is to be noted, it cannot be placed on the gain side of the ledger.

Church Finances.

A comparison of the moneys raised for current expenses before the revival and during the past year gives again rather notable figures. The figures from those churches recording the amount raised for local expenses immediately prior to the campaign and also since the revival, show in total the slight difference of only $507 in favor last year. This indicates that virtually no more money can be produced for local church maintenance, as a result of the revival and its great throng of converts, than was being regularly contributed by the much smaller church membership before the meeting. It justifies the further conclusion, that pastors' salaries have not been increased, and the dream of greater expansion to the local work as a consequence of more money from several thousand additional members, has not been realized. The offering for missions and benevolence from these churches shows a balance on the ledger in favor of the present of $1,543. But deducting from the totals of last year, two unusual contributions amounting to $3,600, subscribed for a local mission church and for an exciting local option campaign, the balance would be decidedly in favor of the period immediately preceding the revival meeting.

A Typical Case.

Let me sum up the situation by citing a perfectly typical case. One congregation had an increase of fifty per cent in its membership from the Sunday revival. Let us use the figures of four hundred and six hundred to report the membership before and after the meeting. With a membership of four hundred, this church had Sunday congregations as large as it now has with six hundred members; with four hundred members it had a prayer-meeting as large as with six hundred members; with four hundred members it had a Sunday-school as large as with six hundred members; and with four hundred members the offerings for missions and current expenses were as large as now with six hundred members. I have not singled out this congregation to utilize an extreme case. This church is typical of the general situation.

Other Indications.

But this is not the extent of a proper analysis of the strength of the churches. Other considerations in addition to those already cited furnish occasion for disappointment. For example, certain churches had Brotherhoods numbering into the hundreds before Mr. Sunday's meeting, and today have almost ceased to meet, so depleted have they become in numbers and spirit. The appeal for men to shoulder responsibility and take intitiative in our churches was never more unavailing. In the tone of some pastors—and I have heard a number in recent weeks—there is a certain pathos, hardly repressed, that comes from disappointment and from failure to get your people to grapple with the problems that tug at your hearts and which, recited to them in passionate plea, elicit scarcely a faint gleam of appreciation. There is an inertia in our churches little less than appalling.

Inertia of the Men.

I sat only a few weeks ago with a company of men representing our various churches and numbering perhaps fifty, to hear a Christian leader from St. Louis present the "Men and Religion Forward Movement," probably the most significant and far-reaching of all current church movements. He invited the men of Springfield churches to co-operate in carrying the campaign into our own community. Eight or ten of our leading pastors were present and not one dared to rise to the floor with a positive assurance that the men of his church would attempt to carry out the suggestions of the speaker. I am not relating this to the discredit of the clergy, I am only remarking a fact, which was just as true of the laymen present. None of the laymen, of whom I was one, dared declare in a positive way that the Springfield churches should and would respond to this great challenge. We may differ as to the cause of this inertia. I am inclined to believe it follows as a natural effect of the failure of the greatest united undertaking we have laid our hands to in recent years. Had any one of us predicted two and a half years ago, that Springfield's Christian men would, in this short time, reach a nerveless condition like that revealed in this meeting, he would have been set down as a hopeless pessimist, if not an infidel.

II. The Moral Life of the City.

We have reason to be disappointed in the total failure of the moral reforms, which Mr. Sunday advocated so strenuously. The fiercest sermons preached by the evangelist were directed against cards, dancing, rum and the social evil.

Social Amusements.

It is well known that during the meeting and for a short time after, the card table and the dance-hall were scantily patronized. In social circles these forms of amusement were practically tabu. Many social leaders under the influence of the meeting, solemnly vowed to cease engaging in these pleasures, and did desist for a short time. It is quite as well known by anyone who has taken the pains to investigate, that the next season after the evangelist's departure saw a decided re-action, and it was commonly remarked that cards and dancing were never more prevalent in the social life of the city. What was true of the first season after the revival, is just as true of last season and the present. With exceptions so rare as to be negligible, it must be said that those who solemnly promised to refrain from these amusements are back at the card table and the dance with never more zest.

The Liquor Traffic.

As to the rum traffic, it is patent to all that there has been no curtailment since the meeting. We have more saloons than when Mr. Sunday came to town. Six months after Mr. Sunday's departure there were twenty-four more saloons in Springfield than when he came. In every respect, making due allowance for the financial depression from the inoperation of the mines and certain other industries, the rum traffic is as prosperous as before the famous sermon on "booze" was delivered. The revival meeting resulted in between four and five thousand converts. Fully one half were men, let us say two thousand two hundred. In the very height of the meeting the cleanest and most promising law enforcement mayoralty campaign ever waged in the city was lost. Less than a year after the meeting, before the glow of the meeting had wholly worn off, the local option election was lost by a majority lacking but little of that in the defeat of two years before. Remember the churches were nearly five thousand stronger, supposedly. Place the voters among the converts at two thousand. Suppose only one half of these had previously voted the saloon ticket. Throwing them over to the local option side should have made it possible to overcome a lead of two thousand votes, which is several hundred more than the actual saloon majority of two years previous. But this did not occur, much to the regret of the good citizens. To fully describe the disappointment, the fact must be added that Mr. Sunday himself wound up the campaign the night before election, speaking to enough men to have won the fight with no help from others outside his audience, and brought practically every man to his feet with a promise to vote against the rum traffic the following day. Yet the battle was lost by one thousand four hundred votes.

The Social Evil.

Regarding the social evil, it was thought and heralded far and wide, that life in the underworld had been greatly improved. It was even declared that several of the leading denizens of the district of shame were closing up their places of business and becoming devout Christian women. I speak here with inexpressible sorrow, and in view of efforts I myself made to attach permanently some of these unfortunates to the church: I think you will agree, if aware of the facts, that no man in the churches of Springfield worked more patiently and earnestly to this end than I. Yet it must be confessed that no semblance of a reformation in the underworld of the city remains to tell the story of our revival. I suppose no pastor will deny this assertion, but I have taken the pains to make inquiry among those who from their profession or particular station should know, and without exception I am informed that there is no apparent evidence of even a slight diminution in this most loathsome traffic. The definite number of professionally immoral women in the city for comparison, is not obtainable, as strict surveillance has not for some time been practiced as a means of collecting revenue. These characters are more widely scattered through the city, but I am informed their number is not below the average usually infesting the municipality. My purpose is not to censure the evangelist for the existence of these conditions, but only to show the futility of such a revival as a means of their curtailment.

III. The Lapse of the Converts.

Fundamentally, however, our disappointment concerns not institutions but persons. At the close of the Sunday revival we counted close to five thousand conversions. About three thousand of these were added to our churches. The direct question as to the number of these who are active in the churches today was not put to the ministers, but the fact that the returns in the questionnaire show practically no increase in the active membership of the churches beyond the active membership before the revival began, leaves us with a great company of backsliders in the community. To the hearts of Christian men this is ever the most serious aspect of such an enterprise. This disillusionment with respect to actual persons in whom our hopes were lodged, is more grave than our disappointment with respect to the state of the church, or the moral condition of the community.

Lack of Spiritual Capital.

A new phrase has been recently cast in the scientific world to explain the high mortality rate of very young infants. It is suggested the cause is to be traced to the fact that the child is born with a "lack of biological capital." This is only another way of saying that he is possessed of subnormal vitality. We may use the phrase in connection with the great revival, with the alteration of one word, to explain why the converts backslide. The reason is their "lack of spiritual capital." Mr. Sunday's meeting does not create spiritual life. Every attention is given to method, to first aid to the fainting, to the advertisements and reporters, to expeditious ways of clearing the front seats and getting people to the front, etc., so that this method side of the meeting easily becomes its predominating feature. The impartation of real spiritual capital is decidedly secondary. It is not unfair to say that "conversion" in Mr. Sunday's meeting is not so much based upon a preception of spiritual truth as upon admiration for the evangelist's past-mastership in handling his enterprise. As a result, we have the backsliders, who have hardly gone far enough forward to warrant so serious a characterization as backslider. But they put their hand to the plow and have turned back, and the heart of the church is grieved.

We cannot speak of the lapse of the converts without being brought to the third division of our analysis of the meeting: namely, the positive harm wrought by it.

This, we shall now consider, with the lapsed converts as our starting point.

Positive Harm

Backsliders.

Backsliders in the church are not a neutral factor. They always modify church conditions. A large proportion of the church's enrollment being thus classified, endangers the church's power. This is the first injury that I wish to point out. Any evangelistic enterprise, that adds the unconverted in large numbers to the church, cannot be justified by calling attention to a few staunch Christians whom it added also. The church's strength as an organ of spiritual righteousness, and of the Kingdom of God, depends upon the purity of its evangelistic method. The vulgarizing of that method is bound to result in an inferior church.

But we must consider not alone the harm done the church by the backsliders, but the harm done the backsliders by the church through its revival.

A Serious Business.

The making of backsliders is a serious business. The vast majority of backsliders are further away from the Kingdom than before they united with the church. Few will ever be reclaimed. Their lives are more impervious to the Gospel appeal than before. We must not be satisfied, therefore, in assessing the value of such a campaign, to merely state how many have been benefitted, but we must ask as well the equally important question: How many have suffered harm as a consequence of the revival?

The large number, for example, who have broken the vow they made to eschew cards and the dance—in point of character they are worse than had they made no such vow. What has happened to them represents, perhaps, greater damage than would accrue from the harmful influence of the amusements themselves. One of the great safe-guards to character has been broken down—the sanctity of a vow. To be swept into the making of impulsive promises which, in most instances, were certain to be broken as soon as the hypnotic spell of the organized meeting was broken, is of necessity a demoralizing experience. Character will be looser, and moral effort, as a consequence, will be inhibited and minimized in the future.

Christ's Reputation Harmed.

Secondly—The reputation of Jesus and the church has been harmed by the revival. In view of the conspicuous results of the revival, what impression has the world received regarding the power of the Gospel and the church? The evangelist declared with great warmth and earnestness that Jesus saves, and this was backed up by the re-assurance of numerous personal workers throughout the congregation. But he did not save a large majority of these converts! It may be said that the fault was not with Christ but with the convert. This does not, however, protect the reputation of Jesus as the Savior of men's souls, for the average man will not be made to understand that the fault was with the convert rather than with Christ, when so large a per cent falls back unsaved. Nor does the evangelist suffer in the estimation of the populace. Mr. Sunday is not criticised by the world. It is the church that must bear the criticism. Mr. Sunday entertained and amused the people to the degree that theatres and nickelodeons were temporarily unpatronized. He is not condemned. The condemnation falls on the preachers and the churches for not holding and utilizing this vast concourse of people turned over to them. As the meeting closed, the ministers commended the evangelist and his meeting without stint. Very naturally, therefore, any censure for what has resulted since is put upon the clergy and the church. It is a very common remark heard in the community that Mr. Sunday was all right, and if the church, into which the converts went, had not been an iceberg they would still be active Christians. The reputation of Jesus as the Savior of men's souls and the church as His agent, has been irreparably damaged by the forced methods and unwarranted promises, made for Him and in His name under the artificial conditions of the revival.

Respect for Evangelism Weakened.

Third—If this is the community's judgment of the church and the Gospel, what must of necessity be the consequence as to the effectiveness of the church's evangelism? Precisely, I think, what the facts indicate. Nothing is more apparent in our church today than its evangelistic paralysis. Not a single evangelistic effort of any proportions, to my knowledge, has been made since Mr. Sunday's departure. Further than this, the number of conversions in the churches has been reduced in an astounding degree, and the conversions reported are almost entirely from among the Sunday-school scholars, showing that the church's evangelistic appeal has been shorn of its vital power. On the basis of statistics from churches reporting the total conversions for both last year and the years prior to Mr. Sunday's meeting, so that comparison could be made, there is shown a decline of forty-three per cent in conversions today in contrast with the period preceding the revival. From the questionnaire as a concrete illustration of this, I can point you to a single church with a large membership, which in former years had regularly from thirty-five to seventy-five or more conversions within a year, and this too without a heated revival. This same church, within fifteen months, has had but two conversions. Of course, this lack of evangelistic effectiveness may be variously explained. In the case referred to, I am told the minister has always been evangelistically successful. His members say his preaching has lost none of its former evangelistic fervor, and there is a constant appeal to the unsaved in every message. The explanation is not, therefore, to be found in the preacher. It must lie, accordingly, either with the congregation which has decidedly re-acted from evangelism, or with the popular sophistication concerning evangelism, making the pulpit's message an ineffectual invitation to repentance. Since this evangelistic paralysis has existed only since the revival, and has no notable parallel in the years preceding, it is reasonable to conclude that it results from the Sunday revival. If the evangelism of Mr. Sunday makes evangelism unpopular with the church, or the Gospel message ineffective with the disillusionized populace, we may well pause to reflect. We may rebel, all of us, against certain types of evangelism, but when the church ceases to be evangelistic because it cannot tolerate a particular variety of evangelism, a sad day for spiritual religion has arrived!

No Pastor Wishes Another.

Fourth—It is not without considerable significance that in my questionaire returned by nearly every preacher in the city, in answering the query, "What practical task would you like the united church of the city to undertake?" not a single one suggested a Sunday meeting or even a union revival, nor was there one word approaching anything like that, except from one minister who has been in the city only a few months, who suggests "a general revival." This same pastor has a congregation with an enrolled membership of four hundred, of which number he puts down as working membership only one hundred and fifty. A very large percentage of the congregation was enrolled as a consequence of the Sunday revival. I do not think, with this fact in view and from the general way in which the answer was put, that this pastor was suggesting his desire for a similar revival to that of two and a half years ago.

A Moral Verdict.

Fifth—Any a priori consideration lies quite outside the range of this questionnaire. We are here endeavoring to base a judgment of this revival wholly upon its results. The facts and conditions with which this investigation deals are objective, concrete fruits of the revival. Every tree is to be judged by its fruits.

But as Christian men, we ought to base our judgment not alone upon fruits, but upon the inherent character of the revival. It is our moral duty to try every spirit by the test of its moral quality, and to affirm in the face of any specious-looking facts to the contrary, that a bad tree cannot bring forth good fruit. But it seems hardly necessary to wait for judgment until such facts are gathered as have been brought together by this questionnaire. It is possible to make a judgment of the revival by short cut, a judgment based upon the character of the meeting itself. A crass theology, an unchristian temper, a wholly unwarranted hypnotic method, an indelicate treatment of people and subjects, and the personal centrality of the evangelist in his message, advertising, etc., together with extreme sensationalism and a blood-curdling irreverence, should in itself, to say nothing of the observed results, give sufficient data for a moral judgment as to the possible effects of such a meeting. If the minister and the church have been criticized for failure to assimilate the great company of converts, it must be said that even Mr. Sunday himself could not have accomplished this. The very atmosphere of the meeting was bound to make unappealing any type of service which might again be held in the individual churches. It cannot be forgotten how eagerly every pastor put forth his utmost effort in sermon and in pastoral care, to the extent even that in some cases health was broken down; how you used the revival songs, and introduced the informality of the revival, and even went so far sometimes as to use the very speech of the evangelist in trying to carry over into your own church the atmosphere of the tabernacle. If ever pastors labored with zeal born of a spiritual burden, and congregations sought by every conceivable means to save the crowd, God knows this was the case in Springfield! And no layman worked more nearly to his limit and more faithfully for his ability than did your essayist.

Revival Not Essentially Spiritual.

But the fact is that the revival was not a natural flowering of the religious spirit. It had no sufficient foundation in the life of our churches or our community. It was forced, artificial, manipulated. It was not essentially spiritual; it did not grow up indigenously; it was superimposed upon the community as an exotic.

The Sunday meeting has left our community disillusionized with respect to religion. Springfield is today, and will be for some time, like a burned out district. Religious emotion has been burned out. The sacred power of the souls of men to respond naturally to the gentle knocking of Christ at the door, has been coerced and strained by the high-pressure organization of the Sunday meeting, and the effect of it all is to leave the community wary and sophisticated with respect to any normal measures that may be undertaken to win it to Christ.

A Vision of Angels

A Different and a Deeper Christmas Story

BY IDA WITHERS HARRISON

Ruth stood by the window, watching her sister and Benny with an aching, anxious heart. The little boy lay in the same stupor he had been in for a day and night; and he looked now, except for his short, soft breathing, as though the death they dreaded had already come.

His mother sat by him, staring at him with wide, despairing eyes. There was something in her face that frightened Ruth even more than the little boy's dangerous condition.

Presently, Mrs Brown arose, and with lagging, listless step started across the room to the bureau, where the medicine was; but before she got there she reeled and would have fallen if Ruth had not sprung forward and caught her.

"You see, sister," she said, reproachingly, "you have broken yourself down; you have not slept for three days and nights. Come and lie down on the bed by Benny—you can watch him just as well as if you were sitting by him."

She half led half carried Mrs. Brown to the bed, and gently forced her to lean back against the nest of pillows there. The poor mother gazed down on the dear, pallid face, and took one of the limp, little hands in hers.

"Mary—darling," said Ruth, bending over her, "don't look so hopeless. You have been such a brave woman—you have borne so much—don't give up now."

Mrs. Brown made no reply, but placed her other hand over the little hand she held.

"The doctor has not given up hope," urged Ruth. "You must not give up—you must keep up for Tom's sake. What would become of him without you?"

Mrs. Brown lifted her heavy eyes for the first time, and asked,

"Where is Tom?"

"He is asleep in the next room."

Mrs. Brown looked at her sister dumbly, but Ruth knew what she meant, and answered as though she had asked a question,

"He has hardly been drinking anything since Benny has been so ill; the doctor gave him something just now to quiet his nerves, and give him some rest."

"Poor Tom! what would he do without his sweetie boy!"

She leaned back on the pillows with closed eyes, and a spasm crossed her face; not that she realized at all what it would be to her and Tom to lose their little boy; that merciful dullness—that blessed bewilderment that often comes with our supreme sorrows was upon her. The pang of parting would be past bearing, if we could realize at once what it meant. Mrs. Brown even felt—and with a kind of contempt for herself for thinking of such a trifle—a sense of comfort from the soft pillows at her aching back. She gently pressed the little hand she held, and thought how often she had held on to that dear hand as her only anchor in life. When Tom was drinking, and she would be sitting up for him at night, she had often crept to Benny's little crib, and clung to his soft warm hand, and felt that it quieted her terrors and gave her fresh courage. Surely, there never was a life more precious—his father loved him so—and for her—he was the sun—the centre of her being. God was good—he would not take their only child; there were so many children in the world that could be so much better spared—she knew a woman across the street, who was always complaining of having so many children—of so many hungry mouths to feed—who beat her little ones—who neglected them—

Suddenly, a wide view seemed to open out before her—a lovely green plain, flooded with soft, tinted light, like that of a summer sunrise. The air was delicately sweet, as though it had passed over a garden of fragrant flowers afar off. And there were sweet sounds, too; at first she thought they were rare music; but after listening, she knew them to be two voices talking; presently she could even hear what they were saying. One was a deep voice like an organ, and the other was soft; and every time the soft voice spoke, she felt as though her heart was a stringed instrument, and some loving hand were playing on it.

"Nay, it is best," said the deep voice; "he is one of the Master's lambs—it is time he were in the fold."

"Hath the Father called him yet?" asked the soft voice.

"Not yet; he would have you go and bring him."

"Thou standest in the presence of the Father," eagerly said the soft voice (and it stirred the listener's heart so strangely, she could scarcely breathe) "hath he considered the poor mother, how hard her life hath been —how much the child is to her?"

"Not a sparrow falleth without the Father knowing," said the deep voice, with gentle reproach.

"I know—I know," hastily; "but his ears are ever open to our cry. I was—I am her mother, and I know every pang she feels."

The voice paused a moment, then went on pleadingly,

"Her husband is a prisoner to that evil spirit, strong drink. Thou knowest what that brings on a loving wife—unkindness—want—daily and nightly dread—"

"But she loveth him—he loveth her," interrupted the deep voice, "and love is life's greatest good."

"She looks to the child to save his father," went on the soft voice, as though not hearing, "even when life hath been darkest, she hath trusted that the child may do for its father what she hath failed in. O great Gabriel, can'st thou not intercede?"

"Daughter," said Gabriel, rebukingly, "thy Father doth not willingly afflict those who love him. He chastiseth in love and wisdom. Thy love and pity for thy child hath blinded thee, so thou can'st not see what is right. Lift thy heart unto Him now in prayer, and he will show it is best the Shepherd should take the little lamb to his bosom. And as this poor sorrowing soul hath been stricken and smitten heavily, it is permitted thee to go to her and reveal the Father's will."

There was a pause—and then the soft voice said in thrilling tones,

"Praise be unto his holy name forever—for all his judgments are holy and just and good!"

Mary had listened with fast beating heart; she lifted her eyes now, and saw a figure in dazzling apparel; a shining light was around the head, but through the glory she saw a beloved face, and with a yearning cry—"Mother—Mother!"—she fell before her with outstretched arms, and would have embraced her feet.

"Thou mayest not touch me, till thou art ascended to the Father," said the loved voice, a little sadly. "He hath sent me to comfort thee, and tell thee of his will."

"Mother, it is such peace and joy to look in your eyes," said Mary; "if I might but see you sometimes, I could endure all things."

"It cannot be, my child," said the Mother. "Thou must overcome life's sorrows and difficulties by faith in the Master. The Father hath permitted me to come to thee, because thy burden was getting past thy strength. Thou knowest he sent angels to strengthen the Master in his great agony."

She paused a moment, then went on,

"And yet, I have been permitted to be near thee a few times in thy great need. Dost thou remember the night thy little Benny came, when thou wast alone in the house with thy husband, and the pangs of childbirth seized thee, and he was in so heavy a stupor, thou could'st not rouse him—how thou wast not afraid in thy extremity, but felt calm and fearless. I was by thee then."

"I remember—I remember," cried Mary, "and presently he aroused himself, when I had almost given up hope of waking him, and went for help."

"And how, when he had been gone many days, and thou had'st not heard from him, and feared some terrible thing had befallen him—and thou had'st but a few crusts of bread, and no money to buy more—and thou did'st fall on thy knees by thy sleeping babe, too dull and despairing to pray even—"

"And a strange peace and quiet fell upon me," cried Mary. "And it was you, my dear mother!—and Tom came home that night, more at himself than he had been for months, and we had a long, sweet time before he fell back in the old bondage."

She gazed on her mother, and drank in the heavenly sweetness of her smile—then a shadow fell on her face, and she said entreatingly,

"Mother, you must not think accusingly of my poor husband; when he is drinking he does not know what he is doing or saying; it is as though an evil spirit had him. It is not given to many wives to have so loyal and unwavering a love as he lavishes on me."

"It is not given to many husbands to have so loyal and unwavering a love as thou givest him," said the mother—

"He is my husband—I love him," said Mary, simply. "I have often thought that if I were more wise and patient and trustful, I might have helped him more to struggle against his bondage; for he does struggle—he hates it."

The shadow deepened on her face, and there was a sob in her voice as she said,

"Mother—my angel boy—I had trusted it had been he who would have saved his father!"

"I know—I know, my child."

"That hope supported me," cried Mary, the blessed tears filling her eyes—she had not wept since the child had been so ill—"even when things looked most hopeless. If his love for his little boy could not help to loose his chains, I looked forward through the dark years to the time when that boy was a good, noble man, leading his father out of temptation—strengthening him—supporting him—saving him, as no woman could do."

She looked beseechingly up at the heavenly pity on the dear face above her, and went on,

"Mother, if God takes him from me, he takes not only what is a thousand times more to me than my own life, but all the hope of my future. Mother, God heard the prayer of his servant of old, and spared his life—would he not spare my little ewe lamb to me, if I besought him?"

"But thou wilt not ask, my child, when thou knowest it is best for thee, and the father, and the child."

"Best for his father, mother?" asked Mary, incredulously.

"How may that be, when his father worships him? O, no—no!—it would drive him to reckless despair—it would make him hopeless—it would take all motive for good away from him."

'My child," said the mother, gently, "thou forgettest thy husband's child-like faith. When he who is our Brother was on earth, he said, 'To whom much is forgiven, the same loveth much!' Thy husband hath grieved him much, but when he comes to himself, he feels a passion of need and gratitude to the Master which passeth even thy faith. His belief in heavenly things is as simple and undoubting as thy little Benny's. Even when he seemed most hopelessly enslaved to drink, the skeptics cold sneer has never passed his lips."

"I have so often thanked God for it," cried Mary.

"When thy dear one goes to the Master's arms, he will be as real to his father, as though he could see and touch him. He will be ever striving to do nothing to offend his little boy's stainless heart, or bring a cloud to his sweet face. The thought that his little one is in the Heavenly City, will be an ever present help to resist temptation and to set his face steadfastly toward it. To be a father to one of the little ones who always behold the Father's face will be more to him than the earthly son thou did'st dream of. Thy little angel will be the Father's hostage that thy husband shall follow him."

Mary looked dumbly at the angelic face above her; the tears were streaming down her face—but it was a healing rain.

"Thy little flower was but lent thee for a brief while," went on the mother—oh, so tenderly and lovingly, "to comfort and bless thee in thy sorrows, and to make his father love him, and all that was pure and innocent through him. His little mission on earth is finished. He was never meant for life's struggles and difficulties—he was too tender a plant, too stainless a soul for earth's rough storms. Dost thou not remember how he loved holy things from a babe?"

"I do—I do," sobbed Mary. "It was ever natural to him to pray— he loved it. And of all things I used to tell him, he loved best to hear of the gentle Saviour. I remember once," she said, brokenly, "a poor ignorant boy came, and Benny got his picture books and showed him, and his father and I overheard him telling about Jesus—all the sweet story, from the little babe to the cruel death. We wondered that he knew it so well—he told it so sweetly and reverently."

"He was one of the Master's messengers," said the gentle spirit.

"And when I took him with me to church," Mary went on, "he was ever quiet and reverent. I remember once, I opened my eyes during prayer, to see if he were restless, and he was standing by me with bowed head and closed eyes. O, that dear little bowed head! —that dear little head!"

"Hast thou never noted," said the Mother, "how many little ones are called, before their child-hearts are stained by sin? So many—so many of those spotless little souls return to the Shepherd's arms. They are his hostages in heaven, that those who loved them on earth will follow them. Thinkest thou not, it is easier to set your affections on things above when your little treasure is there?"

Mary was silently sobbing, and the soft voice went on,

"They speak louder to loving, sorrowing hearts than the most eloquent preacher of God's word. There is not even a little babe who goes back to the Master's arm, without accomplising its little work. It lives again in the holier thoughts of those who loved it here. My child," and her voice took a more thrilling tone, "can'st thou not willingly give back thy darling to the loving Saviour—when thou knowest it is best for him?"

Mary's head sank in her hands, and it seemed as though her heart must break. "I love him so—I love him so," she groaned.

"Think not the Father is unmindful of thy pangs. He knows that the loss of an only son is the supremest of earth's sorrows. Did he not give his only son to show his love for us?"

Mary started; she had never before taken to heart what God's gift to us was.

"He gave his son to suffer—to die for you—can you refuse to give him back the stainless soul he lent you—not to suffering —but to sinlessness—to safety—to perfect happiness?"

Her voice with all its softness had a trumpet ring to it, and Mary, even through her mist of tears, could see a yet diviner light on the radiant face.

"Thou hast been called through much tribulation—great will be thy reward. The God of love and comfort will comfort thee; thy sorrow will be the key that will unlock to thee all sorrowing hearts, and thou shalt be able to comfort them with the comfort wherewith our Father hath comforted thee. O, there is so much of blessed service before thee!—service for the Master and for his little ones. Can'st thou not yield to his loving will?"

It seemed to Mary her heart was bursting. She fell with her face to the ground; she knew not whether she spoke or not, but in her aching, breaking heart she felt, "Father, thy will be done."

"Blessed be his holy name," said the voice, and it was like joyful music. "Lift thine eyes, O, lift thine eyes, my poor sufferer—God hath granted thee one brief glimpse of paradise, to stay thee in thy grief."

Mary raised her tear-dimmed eyes, and saw!—that which is unspeakable; no tongue could utter the glories of that heavenly vision. And her ear was filled with the dear music of her mother's voice, uttering the familiar words:

"These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God and serve him day and night in his temple; and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them nor any heat. For the lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

Mary knew not how long that gracious vision lasted; it seemed to melt away like a joyful love, looking down on her with such lovely sunset, not all at once, but gradually. The voice ceased, but there still rang in her ears the blessed words,

"And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

Suddenly, in the softened light the fading vision had left, she saw One standing!—that face full of unutterable love—of divine pity!—she knew him!—she knew him!

"Master!" she cried, as that other sorrowing Mary had cried long ago.

But what was that he held so closely—so tenderly to his bosom! That little glorified face, looking up at the Master with such loving sorrow—her little lamb—her own little Benny!

"Lo, I am with you always—even to the end of the world," she heard a tender voice saying.

What was this cold touch on her hand that seemed to send an icy chill to her heart! What were those warm drops that were falling on her face! Bewildered, she started up and saw—Ruth's face, full of pity and sorrow, bending over her, her streaming tears falling on her. Instinctively, she turned to look at her little Benny!—that sacred stillness—that heavenly, changeless smile—ah, she knew!—she knew!

She raised the little, lifeless hand, she had held all along, to her lips, and kissed it gently, then laid it tenderly on the pulsless heart. She would have risen from the bed, but Ruth's arms were around her—Ruth's wet face was pressed against her shoulder.

"He went so sweetly and quietly," she sobbed. "His breathing was so gentle, I did not know when it stopped. He opened his eyes wide, and the sweetest, beautifulest smile came on his little face—you can see it still. O, Mary!—sister, let us bear it together!"

"When did he go?" Mary asked.

"But a moment ago—forgive me darling, that I did not wake you. It came so quickly —so gently, I did not know what it was— I called you—you did not hear. Darling—darling, let us weep together!"

Mary gently loosed her sister's arms from around her, and rose from the bed; she walked around to the other side of it, and stood looking on the dead little boy. Ruth watched her with an awe that dried her falling tears. That strange, exalted calm—that far-off look in her dilated eyes—it was unnatural! It surely meant her reason was giving way.

"My little flower—my tender plant!" was all she said.

"Sister," faltered Ruth, timidly laying her hand on her shoulder, " do you know tnat he is—"

"He is risen; he is not here." Mary answered quietly; and then she started, and asked, "My dear husband,—does he know?"

"No—I dared not call him."

"I must not stay here—I must go to him and comfort him."

She turned again to the little boy, and said, "The only son of his mother, but she is not a widow, thank God," and left the room with the same steadfast, and to Ruth, awful tranquility.

Ruth heard her enter the next room—heard Tom start up—heard him ask, "How is he?" —then heard him groan,

"My sweetie boy!—My little man!"

And she knew he was clinging to Mary.

The Kingdom of God will come not through organization but through inspiration. Its sign will not be the domination of a church, but the regeneration of humanity. When man to man shall brother be the world over, and war shal no longer drench cornfields with blood; when women are everywhere honored, and children are protected; when cities are full of health and holiness, and when the burden of misery has been lifted from the poor, then the world shall know Christ has not died in vain, and his vision shall be fulfilled.—John Watson.

"There is no more vexing possession than a conscience that weakly protests, but is not strong enough to control. It frets and complains at wrong, but it is too feeble to enforce the right; it only makes its owner uncomfortable, it does not rule or guide him. It cannot be at peace in questionable ways, but it never resolutely compels the walking in any other."

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Moonlight School in Rowen County Kentucky

Rowan County is situated in the mountain section of Eastern Kentucky, and is one of the poorest counties in the state. The Rowan County Feud is still remembered as one of the bitterest ever known in the mountains, and twenty-five years ago the streets of Morehead, the county seat, were the scene of battle after battle between the combatants.

A gentleman of Lexington, a member of the Christian Church, was deeply concerned at the condition of things there; he felt that the people were not to blame, for they were acting according to the traditions and social usages that prevailed among them. Loyalty to family was a duty with them, and wrong or insult to any member of it must be atoned by blood; it was essentially the same code that obtained among gentlemen sixty years ago, when the duel was considered the only settlement of certain differences between men of honor. He saw that what they needed was education, and a personal touch with the progress and ideals of today.

A Flourishing School.

So, while the feud was at its height, he sent a young man, Frank C. Button, and his brave mother, Mrs. Phoebe Button, to open a school in Morehead. It has been in existence for nearly a quarter of a century, and Prof. Button has been in charge of it during the whole time, his noble mother assisting him until she was called up higher. The school has become a large institution—it has an enrollment now of 375 pupils, and will doubtless have five hundred before the close of the term; Morehead has grown to be a flourishing town, as law abiding as any in the state. In Rowan County, during the past year, there was not a single murder—life and property are as safe there as in any county in the land. This wonderful change is largely owing to the beneficent influence of this Christian school, and the good man who has been its leader and guiding spirit. About twelve years ago, the Morehead Mountain School passed into the hands of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and in the graduating class that year was a young man, whose grandfather and five uncles had been killed in the feud. They were of the same fine material as this splendid young scholar, but they lacked the education and opportunity that a better day had brought him.

The Passion for Education.

But while a brighter day has dawned for Rowan County, there is still much illiteracy among the people. Those of school age eagerly embrace the opportunities for education; their appreciation of it is shown by the unusual fact that there are more pupils enrolled this year than the school census shows. The passion for education among the young people is shown by the difficulties they overcome to attain that end. One of the teachers of a rural school told of some of her boys who had waded through a creek in water up to their necks rather than miss a day in school. It is in the adult population of the county that illiteracy still ingers; this is not of choice, but of necessity; the soil is so poor, and the country so broken, that it is only by the hardest toil that a bare living can be made—and the bread-winners of a family have neither time nor money to go to school.

Woman's Heart Burdened.

This condition of things lay like a burden on the heart of the County Superintendent, Mrs. Cora Wilson Stewart. She is a fine type of modern womanhood, and her work therefore is a fit subject for this page. She is a mountain woman and received practically all of her education at the Morehead Mountain School. The state this year recognized her worth by making her president of the Kentucky Educational Association—the first woman who has ever held that position. She finally evolved a plan to give the people of the county past school age an opportunity to receive some instruction, and this was by holding Moonlight Schools for their benefit. They could only be held on moonlight nights, because the roads are so bad that it would not be safe to travel them on dark nights.

She had no money for the work, so in order to carry her plan into effect she had to depend on the voluntary and unpaid services of the rural school teachers. She has about fifty teachers in the county, and they willingly agreed to help in the noble enterprise. Some of them had to walk a mile and a half to their homes to supper, after teaching all day, and cheerfully walked back to the school house to teach two hours in the evening. Nearly every one of these noble young teachers had received this training at our Morehead School and are an example of the spirit that prevails there.

Newspaper the Best Primer.

The moonlight schools began at the opening of the school term this year, and continued for two weeks each month throughout the fall. They have to be discontinued in the winter, because the "creeks are up," (to use the mountain phrase) and there are no bridges to cross them. The machinery of the moonlight schools is very simple—the school houses, the public school teachers working free of charge, a black board, a few copy books, and a little newspaper, The Rowan County Messenger, published by Mrs. Stewart, from which they learn to read. This unique reader has been proven to be better for those of mature years than a primer—it tells of people they know, and has names and events in it with which they are familiar.

During the months in which the rural night schools were conducted, over 1200 attended them—people largely in middle life or old age, the youngest was eighteen, the oldest eighty-six. A majority of them could read and write, but wanted more information—more than a hundred of these learned to read and write. One man when he was able to write his name shouted, "Glory to God, I never have to make my mark again!"

Overcoming Illiteracy.

A preacher of the gospel, over fifty years of age, learned to read and write, and is now able to read the Word of God to his church. One of the most touching things in the work has been that when a man or woman in middle life learns to read, the first book that he wants is the Bible. Mrs. Stewart has promised a copy of the Holy Book to each one of these. What an era in their lives when for the first time they open that Book and read it for themselves!

Something of the splendid spirit in the superintendent and her teachers is found in their scholars. Mrs. Stewart has chosen for her chief aim, No illiteracy in Rowan County, and she finds her moonlight pupils as responsive to this unselfish and patriotic ideal as for their own personal instruction.

Over the roads of Rowan County in days gone by have marched the fuedists, and often its steep and rocky way has been sprinkled with their blood; over them have walked men seeking the secret moonshine stills; over them have toiled the great wagons, laden with timber, and the wealth of the mountains; but no more noble and distinguished company ever trod these rough roads, or any roads, than these men and women, after the day's hard toil, seeking the knowledge that had been so long denied them!

Women of Note

—Queen Mary of England, now in India, appears to be quite sensible compared with most women of the royal purple. She is said to have devoted the bulk of her coronation gift from the "Marys" of the United Kingdom to the founding of a holiday home for working girls. Barn House, in Whitstable, has been acquired and will be made into a home for tired working girls of London to retire to for a week or two after the busy London season.

—Next year the New York school girl is going to learn to swim. A course of lessons in various natatoriums throughout the city will qualify the girls for certificates. Three woman instructors in swimming have been appointed and four more will be selected shortly. The work of instruction will be in charge of Miss Adeline Trapp, who holds the woman's long distance record for swimming in local waters.

—Dr. Dora Greene Wilson, vice-president of the Kansas City Suffrage Association, says the clinging vine variety of woman will soon be a thing of the past, along with the woman with gauzy silk stockings and the dainty black slipper. She says the latter will be superseded by a woman with roomy, square-toed shoes and clothes enough on to keep her warm. The doctor does not follow the facts of life. The clinging vine type will not die out as long as there is a wage earning member of the opposite sex to cling to. Neither will the other type criticized, for such extreme and showy styles are worn because of the attention and popularity they bring the wearer. The doctor does not know the sex she discusses. Women will never wear "square-toed, roomy shoes" as long as they have feet to put in something else.

—Another ideal Daughter of the American Revolution has just passed away. Mrs. Fannie Barton died at Elgin, Ill., last week, at the age of ninety-one years. She was the daughter of a private in Washington's army.

—Germany is waging war on the deadly hatpin that women have been wearing of late years. The latest development is that women whose hatpins are considered dangerous to public safety may be debarred from travelling by train.

—Emma Goldman, an anarchist who is against bloodshed and wanton destruction of property, was recently the guest of honor at a dinner given by C. W. Eliot of Harvard, a grandson of the famous college president. "Highbrow" professors and other ladylike persons are said to have left the place affronted at this radical action of a Junior at a big school.

—Miss Fannie Bixby has resigned as probation officer of the county juvenile court of Los Angeles, Calif. Miss Bixby is a woman of a large independent fortune, a graduate of Wellesley College, and was the pioneer woman police officer in the United States. Miss Bixby resigns because of her health and for the sake of devoting more of her time to general philanthropic work for boys and girls.

Boys and Girls

The Difference

Eight fingers,
Ten toes,
Two eyes,
And one nose.
Baby said,
When she smelt the rose,
"Oh, what a pity
I've only one nose."
Twelve teeth
In even rows,
Lots of dimples,
And one nose.
Baby said,
When she smelt the snuff,
"Dearie me!
One is enough." —Selected.

Quick Wits and the Indians

BY REX O. HOLMAN.

Down the old cow path staggered a boy, trying to run, but making but little headway. The lad's honest, strong features were drawn out of shape by pain—the expression of one who has run until he feels that another step must kill him. If you have ever seen the finish of a long-distance race, perhaps you can imagine the strained look that distorted Paul Leesit's face. He too, was running a long-distance race. But it was not for ribbons, or medals, or for the honor of a school that he ran. There were no spectators in bedecked grandstands to cheer him on. Yet he was exerting every nerve and torturing lungs and muscles to their utmost efforts that he might win the race. His very life, the lives of a village, depended upon the result. Win he must, and win he would!

It was before the war of the Revolution. The Indians had suddenly broken their treaty with the whites and, without any warning, had descended upon the little village of Bethel, whooping in savage glee while they shot their arrows against the hurriedly-closed stockade. The men of Bethel, with the help of women and children to load their guns, had managed to hold off the Indians for a night and a day, but this was about all. They had not discouraged the savages in the least, while they themselves were deeply disheartened. They knew that they must have help or be massacred. They might hold out another night, but there would be no hope the next day unless something unexpected happened.

Thus it was that Paul Leesit happened to be running this grilling race. He had offered to go to Hatsborough, the nearest village, for help. He was the fastest runner in Bethel, he had argued, so why shouldn't he attempt the task? Some friends had tried to hold him back; but failed. Under cover of darkness, Paul had slipped out of the stockade, and wriggled throught the Indians before they noticed him. But luck was against him, it seemed, for a sudden flash of lightning disclosed him, and was answered by a yell from the savages that told Paul that he was pursued. Just how many were following him, he was unable to see, but he knew that they would not let him get away without a fierce struggle. So he ran—ran as he had never run before! Try as he might, he could not dodge all of his pursuers. Every once in a while the hiss of an arrow warned him of this fact. Once he even heard the breathing of one of the fiends. And thus had been the race for eight swampy, sandy, rocky, briery miles—sometimes running, sometimes hiding, sometimes tearing a path through a tangle brush. And still Paul was not permitted a chance to catch an easy breath. Still one or two relentless Indians followed. A number of times they had lost the trail, but somehow could not be baffled long. Paul could not see them and they could not see him, except at long intervals, but each knew that the other was near.

Two more miles remained before Hatsborough would be reached. The Indians were determined that no message should ever get there. It was evident that they would follow Paul to the very gates before they would let him spoil their plans. So continued the struggle. At last Paul found his feet in a smooth trail. It was the cow-path that led to the village. Had he better run the risk of using this open trail, or would he stand a better chance to dodge about in the brush? Well, perhaps the Indians might not expect him to use the path. Perhaps he might be able to move with less noise in it. So down the path the plucky boy staggered.

A half-mile was covered. Wh-hiz-zip! An arrow took away Paul's cap. The heedless lightning had searched him out. The boy had thought he was running as fast as he could, but now he knew he was mistaken. The warning arrow increased his speed. But his lungs! O, how they smarted and struggled for oxogen! His legs! They felt as though every muscle were torn loose from their tendons and tied in hard knots. His head ached and a strange dizziness clouded his brain at times. Yet the race continued.

After another heart-breaking half mile, Paul heard a dull roaring sound ahead. It was not voices. What could it be? O, yes, Paul remembered. It was the old milldam on Betsy Creek. Could he ever gather up strength enough to cross it? This was a new worry to the poor lad as he stumbled along with the patter of pursuing feet in his ears. His strength had just about given out. How was he to cross the Betsy? A cloud seemed to envelope his courage. But it was the cloud that goes before sunshine, for suddenly a bright thought flashed forth a ray of hope. The milldam must be his preserver. He remembered an old trick that he had often played while in swimming.

At last the creek was in sight. Along its bank plunged the boy. Ah, there was the dam! Paul glanced back for his savage pursuers. He fancied that he could hear them, but they were not to be seen. For the first time in forty hours Paul smiled. Then he filled his heaving lungs and dived head first into the wall of water that thundered over the dam. The force of his plunge carried him through, and he dropped to his knees upon the stone base of the dam. Over his head poured tons of water, but still he breathed, for the height of the wall and the pressure behind the water forced the flood behind his crouching figure. By hugging close to the wall it was not hard to find an abundance of air. Would the Indians ever think to look for him in such a place, Paul wondered. Then he stopped worrying. He had fainted.

When again he gained consciousness, the boy still lay beneath the waterfall, safe. Trembling, hoping, half dazed, he waited. But no savage form plunged into his hiding place. After half an hour the boy's strength and courage returned. He remembered the people of Bethel whose lives hung upon his efforts. He must not wait longer. He must take his chances once more. With a prayer to God for the power to cover the remaining mile, he caught his breath and plunged out into the open.

Not an Indian was in sight. Paul listened intently and long. Not a sound of danger! The peril was not past, perhaps, but there was hope. Silently the young messenger sped away.

Eight minutes later the Hatborough watchman carried the panting boy into a cabin. Ten minutes later fifty armed men were on their way to Bethel, shouting the praises of Master Paul Leesit. The next morning found Bethel rescued, and joining her voices in the same shouts of praise.

Why the Cat Family Didn't Move

Mrs. Dappled Gray lived in the barn where the hay was stored, with her three little kittens. One kitty was black and one white and one gray, just like his mamma cat.

When they got big enough to open their eyes, Mrs. Dappled Gray told her kittens all about the lovely big house and the milk and bread which they should have when they got big enough to go there for their meals as she did.

Every time Mamma Cat came back from the house she told the kittens about the lovely romp she had with the baby and how sunny and nice it was there, till they could hardly wait to go and see it all for themselves.

One day Mamma Cat said, "I have found a nice new house for you in a very large trunk, where some old clothes are kept, and I think we will move in at once."

Then she picked up black kitty and walked right out of the barn with him in her mouth. Mamma Cat went into the hall upstairs, and dropped black kitty in the open trunk there. Then she started for white kitty.

But what do you think! The lady who owned the trunk came out, and, seeing it open, shut it with a bang. She did not know that a dear little fat kitten was in there.

Oh how frightened Mamma Cat was when she came back with white kitty! She scratched and clawed the trunk, and rushed to the lady who was playing with her baby in another room. "Mee-ow, mee-ow! You have your baby, and I want mine," she cried, and rubbed against her dress.

The lady saw Mamma Cat jump on the trunk and scratch it with her sharp claws. "What can the matter be?" said the lady; and she opened her trunk. There cuddled up in the clothes was black kitty, sound asleep.

Before the lady could ask Mamma Cat a single question, she had picked up black kitty out of the trunk and started for the old home and the barn.

When she got the three babies back in the hay, Mrs. Dappled Gray Cat told them that the house was a very nice place to go, but the barn was the best home to bring up little kitties.—Child's Hour.

Some New Books

INDIA'S HURT, and other addresses, by W. M. Forrest. Professor Forrest is the incumbent of the chair of biblical literature in the University of Virginia. For several years he was biblical lecturer at Calcutta, India, under the direction of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and his experience there gave him intimate and sympathetic knowledge of the conditions prevailing in the great empire. He has rendered excellent service to the cause of intelligent knowledge of conditions in the Far East by the preparation of these ten chapters which deal with such themes as "India's Hurt," "India's Need," "Mothers and Daughters of India," "The Old Life and the New in India," "Student Life," "Religious Ideals," "The New Theology and Christian Missions," and "Why Hindus Should Study Hinduism." These chapters are for the most part addresses delivered in India as well as America, and they reveal facts relating to the intellectua life of that land and the necessary point of approach for the missionary such as should prove of great value to students of the question and to those who propose to do missionary work in that land. (St. Louis, Christian Board of Publication. Pp. 171, 50 cents net.)

A MESSAGE FROM BATANG, by Z. S. Loftis, M. D. It is the exceptional man that writes a diary worth publishing. Dr. Loftis, who gave his life for Thibet, was such a man. He sailed as a missionary under the Foreign Missionary Society, Sept. 18, 1908, and fell a victim to smallpox and typhus fever, Aug. 12, 1909. His diary as now published covers less than eleven months' time, but like the view from one of his Thibetan mountains, it opens an inspiring vision of a life's devotion and the far-lying purposes of God. Young and enthusiastic, Dr. Loftis wrote most interestingly of what can most interest us. His notes sparkle with sketches of travel and glimpses of adventure through the heart of China. With the soul of an artist he pictures the beauties of the everlasting mountains, towering five miles into the heavens. His visit to the Litang monastery has all the fascination of original exploration. Gleams of strong sentiment (not sentimentality) wonderfully beautify the exasperating delays and hardships of travel. In this record Dr. Loftis has reared an eloquent monument that points out the open road to the heart of Thibet. (New York, Fleming H. Revell & Co., 75 cents net.)

THE DILEMMA OF THE MODERN CHRISTIAN, by Edward H. Eppens, is a popular statement of present day thought that will appeal to the average person. The following paragraph reveals the point of view of the author. "It is only because Jesus is eternally and supremely right about God that a rejection of him means, for all whom he forced and forces to face the one great issue, a rejection of God. It was only so far as he bore the message of God that he demanded and demands allegiance. The dignity and authority of kingship is vested in the ambassador only because and in so far as he represents the King. That we should accept him for his own sake was no part of his program as a savior. He came as a servant. His God, who is our God, was the Lord." The style of the book leaves the feeling that it is cleverer than it is deep. But no reader will fail to receive insight and inspiration from it. (Boston; Sherman, French & Co. Pp. 180. $1.20 net.)

THE BEAUTY OF SELF CONTROL, by J. R. Miller. It is a pleasure to follow the pen of one who is able to illumine ordinary human relations with touches of sweetness and strength from Jesus' teaching. The sober mind is cheered and the careless is corrected in realizing that the majestic purposes of redemption and the glories of divine truth are concerned with perfecting and embellishing the daily life that we live. In his latest book, "The Beauty of Self Control," Dr. Miller has exhibited phases of the living and livable gospel with special grace and charm. "Finding our Duties," "What About a Bad Temper," "People as means of Grace," "Seeing the Sunny Side," are some of the chapters that will be enjoyable and helpful to all. (Crowell Co., New York, $1.00; postage 10 cents.)

Out on Parole

BY EDGAR WHITE.

Tomasco, an Italian lad, was bound unto Simeon Jones, the farmer. It was a choice with the penitentiary for five years in the background. Tomasco took the farm because he loved the pure air and sunny skies. While hunting work on the railroad construction one winter he became very cold, and broke into the store shanty for some warmer clothes. The law denominated the act burglary and larceny, and on his plea of guilty Tomasco was sentenced to five years in the state's prison. Simeon Jones was in the court room at the time. He took a fancy to the bright-eyed Italian boy, and offered to go on his bond for five years if the judge would take his parole for good conduct. The condition was that Tomasco should work for him the five years, drawing such wage as was paid in that section. Tomasco was delighted with the bargain—for a year. Then the shackles began to grind. The work was hard, and there were no holidays. Simeon Jones was a poor man. His wife was dead, and a daughter, Leah, a gentle girl, kept house for him. Such money as Tomasco needed for clothes and small articles his master gave him, but withheld the greater part of his money until the five years were up.

As year after year went by, Tomasco became sullen. The work seemed to grow harder. His master did not speak kindly like he had at first. All demands for his money were met with a curt refusal. He had to wait. The bondman dared not rebel, as by the terms of his oath he must appear at court accompanied by his master, at stated times, and give an account of himself. A forfeiture meant arrest and the serving of the penitentiary sentence. He was virtually bound, hands and feet. Sold for a price and the money kept back.

Tomasco wrought like a slave in the fields, the forests and among the stock. The pure air and sunny skies had long since grown stagnant and dark to him. His master became the reincarnation of the old slave driver, constantly urging to greater endeavor. He had no pity, no time for rest. Never considered aches and pains. All the warm nature of the serf's blood revolted at the ever-increasing burden laid upon him. The master himself worked like a fiend, as if trying to make it all in a year.

Tomasco counted the days when he should be at liberty. And then the settlement! He sometimes thought it might be worth all the suffering to have the equisite pleasure of telling the master to his face what he thought of him. Then his teeth would close with a snap and his breath come hard. But he must abide the day of emancipation.

After an eternity, a service that had worn wrinkles around his eyes and mouth, it came—the day Tomasco had longed for with an embittered heart. He had made up his mind just exactly what he should do. He was now a well-grown, stalwart young man, easily able to cope with the ageing and work-worn master. Being somewhat versed in the ways of the law, he arranged to take with him a reliable witness, a man who worked on the adjoining farm, but not as a serf. When they met he would say something to the master that would cause him to resent it with a blow. What Tomasco did after that would be self-defense, amply proven by the hired hand of the neighbor. Of course, if he should overdo the thing, and punish the master too severely, the law would take cognizance that a man in resenting a blow cannot exactly gauge his resistance—that would be impossible. Tomasco labored under a high state of excitement all forenoon. When the whistle at the mill blew for twelve, his slavery ended. He had down carefully in a book, the day, hour and minute—five years ago.

Tomasco wondered to find himself so deliriously happy. It was like getting ready to go to a circus or something. It had been a hot day, and he had worked hard in the hay field, stacking and driving. Once or twice he had put his hand to his head and found it singularly free from perspiration. He attributed it to his excitement, his joy at nearing the end.

When the blast from the whistle came he threw down his pitchfork and walked to the division fence.

"Come," he said to the witness. The hired man slipped through the wires and followed. At a hay stack Tomasco stopped.

"This man has driven me like a dog for five years," he said, clinching his hands, while the veins on his face seemed to swell out; "winter cold, summer hot, go, go, go, like an ox; no mercy, no rest, not a holiday."

He paused and clutched at the collar of his blouse.

"Watch close—very close," he said, malignantly; "I'll not hit him first—don't miss that—he'll hit me first, and then—and then—"

The young man put a hand to his head, stretched the other out blindly, and then the world came up gently and all was dark.

Two days later a pale, dark-skinned young man opened his eyes, and looked out on an undulating meadow dotted with trees and cattle. A balmy air played into the window and gently moved the curtain. A large vase of nasturtiums and one of sweet peas were on the center table.

"How's the boy?"

A soft white hand was laid upon his forehead and two large blue eyes looked sympathetically down. The nurse was the gentle Leah, and it was she who had brought the flowers and tidied up his room.

"You've had a time, Tommie," she said, "but you're on the mend now, aren't you?"

He did not speak, but his eyes followed her as she moved over to his dresser and took something therefrom.

"Father is away today, Tommie," she said, "but he left something here for me to give you when you came back to yourself—so you could understand, you know. You've been out of your head a bit."

She held in front of him a check for his wages during the entire five years, making no deduction for the money he had drawn. He held the paper listlessly.

"You know, Tommie," the girl went on, her deft fingers straightening the covers about his bed, "your time is up and you can leave when you get well."

The boy turned his head over toward the window and put his hands to his eyes.

"Why, Tommie!" in astonishment. "What are you crying for?"

At this he buried his face in the pillow so she could not see.

"I—I—I don't want to—to go, Miss Leah," he said. "Won't you please tell—tell him to—to let me stay?"

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Clay City Church is in a revival meeting, conducted by Donald G. Vint.

Evangelist Charles H. Bloom is in a meeting at Franklin, with large congregations hearing his message nightly.

The congregation at Deer Creek invited its minister, L. H. Hooe, to remain in the pastorate with an increase of salary.

District Worker J. D. Williams is in a revival meeting at Ripley, which has had seventeen additions at the end of the first week.

O. M. Eaton is holding a revival meeting for his home congregation at Sailor Springs. During the first week there were reported two additions.

F. A. Welton is reported to have closed his pastorate at Mason City, December 10. No announcement is made as to his future location.

At Sumner, where J. E. Stout is in a meeting, there have been, at last report, eighty-four additions, and promises of many more before the meeting is concluded.

Atlanta Church is having the services of R. W. Abberly in a revival meeting, which began the first Sunday in December, with seven additions the first day.

P. F. York, formerly minister of Sidell Church, is now residing at Hoopeston, from which point it is understood he expects to preach on Sundays.

E. D. Sears, of Maroa Church, is holding a revival meeting at Christian Chapel, near Pulaski. This is the third evangelistic meeting held by Mr. Sears for this church.

The church at White Hall has re-employed its pastor, Robert W. Moore, for a third year. It is expected that Mr. Moore will hold a revival meeting for this church during the winter.

Olney Church, where W. S. Gamboe is pastor, is finishing the basement of its edifice, on account of needed extra room for its work. It is expected the remodeled house will be ready for re-dedication soon.

It is learned that G. W. Ford who had resigned at West Salem, has consented to withdraw his resignation and remain with the congregation, much to the satisfaction of the church.

The revival meeting at Concord, conducted by E. P. Gish, resulted in seven additions, and the entire church inspired to renewed activity. Mr. Gish has been pastor of this church for only a short time.

The congregations at Thompson in the Vawter-Marty meeting are uniformly large. One of the results of the meeting, in addition to a considerable ingathering, is the payment of the entire indebtedness of the church. The meeting has produced great enthusiasm throughout the congregation.

B. F. Cato goes to Bowling Green, Kentucky, at the first of the year. He resigned his pulpit at Lawrenceville much to the regret of the congregation, where he has been laboring for about two years. Mr. Cato's pastorate has been productive of a substantial and healthful development of the church.

The Oblong pastor, J. I. O'Neal, follows an exceptionally good custom in holding each year a missionary meeting for one or two weak congregations. His church this year granted him leave of absence, during which he held a meeting for an Indiana Church and for the Lancaster Church in Illinois. The two meetings resulted in sixty additions, about twenty of these being at the latter point.

The church at Jacksonville extended a very beautiful courtesy to its retiring pastor, R. F. Thrapp. Resolutions of respect and endorsement of his ministry were adopted at the final Sunday morning service of his pastorate. The resolutions were tastily prepared and bound, having on the cover an excellent likeness of the pastor, with the title, "Russell F. Thrapp—An Appreciation." This church is fortunate to have no interim between pastorates. Clyde Darsie, who has been pastor of Quincy Church began his ministry at Jacksonville last Sunday with an auspicious opening, and the congregation evidently determined to accord him the same loyal support which his predecessor had received for ten years.

Eureka College

$150,000 for Eureka College.

I believe our recent campaign was successful because the people throughout Illinois knew exactly what we were trying to do. campaign will be for "$150,000 for Eureka College by September 1, 1911." The next campaign will be for "150,000 for Eureka College." There are four elements in this campaign and we wish to briefly call attention to them.

First: We have launched a movement to raise $5,000 for the expenses of the campaign, so that we will not have to draw upon the general fund of the college to support the field work. This will be an enlargement of the present sustaining group. It will consist of getting a number of people to pledge $25 a year for three years. Already a number of friends of the college have indicated their willingness to have fellowship with us; and we believe this part of the work will be successfully completed among the first things.

Second: We expect to raise $25,000 to build a gymnasium. This is badly needed for two reasons. First: The young people attending college need opportunities for scientific physical training. We have been handicapped for a long time in this respect and the time has come when we must equip ourselves or lose much that has been gained. Second: Young people must have opportunities for legitimate play. There is a sacredness in play. It is absolutely necessary in life and especially in college life. One of my friends said to me recently, that if we announced to our constituency, that we wanted $25,000 for a gymnasium, the folks would think it was foolishness and would turn us down. I do not believe any such nonsense. I feel sure our people in Illinois will see the necessity for an institution of this kind. Pledges on the gymnasium fund will be taken and we will put up the building just as soon as we have the money pledged. We do not expect to run any chances and, therefore, shall wait until we know exactly where the money is coming from for the work.

Third: Eureka College needs a new science hall. We have one building that we call the middle building, which is one of the best on the campus so far as the masonry is concerned. It has not been used to an advantage for some time and we propose to equip it for a science hall. This will cost about $20,000 and will meet a long felt need in the life and work of Eureka College. Personally I feel just as enthusiastic over asking men to give money to build a new gymnasium or science hall as I do for any other department of college work. Both are essential to an adequately equipped college, and Eureka College certainly wants to do this. We owe it to our people in Illinois and they demand it of us.

Fourth: Then we want $100,000 additional endowment. This will probably be the last thing accomplished in the campaign. We have given ourselves twelve years for the completion of the proposition. We now have all indebtedness paid or provided for and have at least $150,000 endowment. With the completion of the present proposition, Eureka College will have $250,000 endowment. This will be a good beginning for larger and better things. As our other campaign was successful because of the publicity we gave it, we have taken pains to state briefly and as comprehensively as we feel justified in doing through the columns of the paper just exactly what we propose to do. We are willing to give information on any point and solicit the co-operation of our friends everywhere. H. H. PETERS.

Call for Men for the Ministry

For the past two years the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ has made a plea to our churches for consideration of the subject of Men for the Ministry. A more worthy subject has not been presented to our churches, nor our ministry.

At this moment, according to the very best authority, we have only fifty-five hundred ministers who devote any part of their time to preaching the Word to eleven thousand churches, which means that fifty-five hundred churches either have no preaching at all or preaching only occasionally. This is a situation that must be met. We may not be able to meet it in a day—though it will not take a generation. If one-half of our ministers will preach upon the ministry as a calling the third Sunday in January and will do personal work among the most likely young men and young women of their congregations between now and January 21, we ought to have as a result at least one thousand men turned to this highest of all high callings.

The interest of our business men in the success of the church is increasingly manifest and the ultimate result of such interest is bound to be a more able ministry and a better paid one. These conditions we have all prayed for in the past. Let us, as ministers, set to work to make them realities.

A few of our schools have small Students' Aid Funds. These ought to be materially increased and by judicious administration we believe such funds possible and no greater need presents itself to our ministerial student body.

The undersigned representatives of our schools and colleges join in making this united appeal for a universal observance of the third Sunday in January ,1912, as the time for presenting the claims of the ministry to the young people of our churches.

Social and Religious Work in Mexico

The institutional and social work carried on by "The People's Institute" at C. Porfirio Diaz, Mexico, conducted by S. G. Inman, under the auspices of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, makes very interesting reading. In a recent letter Mr. Inman says:

"Up to September 1, 137 pupils were enrolled in night classes, which included English, Spanish literature, bookkeeping, geometry, grammar, declamation and music. Besides Mr. and Mrs. Inman and Horacio Quinones, Professors Cervera and Gonzales, of the Public Schools, Prof. Curtis, of the Custom Service, and Lic. Salvador Dumaine, Federal District Judge are on the staff of teachers and have for the most part largely rendered their services gratis. During the months of June and July, there were also conducted a Vacation Day School for children, taught by Prof. Gonzales and Mrs. Inman.

"The spiritual results of the educational work of the People's Institute have been so gratifying that last night we took the preliminary steps for the formal organization of our church here. Fourteen persons who have already become Christians promised to enter the organization, and there are five others who have made their confessions that we hope will be baptized this week. A man made his confession last night who is a typical representative of the class we are trying especially to reach in the institutional work of the institute, the really neglected class in Mexico, who has broken from Catholicism because of the rottenness of its priesthood, and the impossibility of its doctrine for the modern mind, and yet who would hardly attend an evangelistic service of the protestants. His position demanding that he know English, he came to the institute for classes, and after months of faithful effort to clear his mind of the doubt which is so common among the thinking men of Mexico, who are largely influenced by French standards, he has come to the point where he can say, "Lord, I believe; help Thou my unbelief." It has given us much hope to have him take this public stand, for we believe that his example will mean the coming of others, who both for social and intellectual reasons, have been hesitating, though almost persuaded. He is the first of the men who have given their services in teaching in our night classes, to make his public declaration for Christ. He has been teaching a class in telegraphy gratis for us."

Church Life

Roy E. Deadman whose good work at Glenwood Church, Buffalo, N. Y., was recently reported in these columns has accepted a call to Oskaloosa, Ia., and will begin his work Jan. 1. Oskaloosa church is one of the leading congregations of the state of Iowa.

Mrs. Minnie A. Darst of Berkeley, Calif., who was recently ordained to the ministry passed through Chicago recently on her way to Germany where she is to pursue the study of pedagogy and psychology in the University of Jena. Mrs. Darst is deeply interested in the work of religious education.

Mr. W. H. McClain of St. Louis, promtnent as a leader in the Disciples National Sunday-school Convention and as an official of the World's Fair convention held in St. Louis, passed away Dec. 7. The cause of his death was Bright's disease. He will be greatly missed in church circles in his city. He held membership in First Church, of which John L. Brandt is pastor.

R. W. Abberley's meeting with Mark Collis and Broadway Church, Lexington, Ky., is reported by the evangelist as one of the joys of his lifetime. Scores of students from Transylvania university and the other colleges of the city were in constant attendance. Mark Collis, says Mr. Abberley, enjoys the absolute confidence of the entire city. He has been at the head of this church for twenty-one years. There were 127 accessions during the meeting. LeRoy St. John, evangelist, assisted Mr. Abberley.

Claire L. Waite, recently pastor of First Church, Milwaukee, Wis., has accepted the unanimous call of Central Church, Cincinnati, O., and will begin his work Jan. 1. The pastorate will be inaugurated with a "watch meeting" on the last night of the old year. Central Church is the oldest congregation of Disciples in Cincinnati and is still the largest in membership. It is one of the oldest churches in our movement. One of the elders has been a member of Central for sixty-two years. The old building, erected during the pastorate of Dr. W. T. Moore, seats 1,800 people. The church is out of debt and faces the future with confidence in spite of the "down-town" problem. Among its members are many very loyal souls who come great distances to worship at the old church every Lord's Day. Prior to his Milwaukee pastorate, Mr. Waite was for six years pastor of Douglas Park Church, Chicago. It was during his pastorate in Milwaukee that the Second Church was established there, now in its own building on a fine lot and flourishing under the pastorate of Mark Wayne Williams. During the past eighteen months Mr. Waite has been in the evangelistic field. He is a well-equipped leader for this historic and strategic work.

Pres. R. H. Crossfield of Transylvania University and Prof. J. E. Sturgis of Butler, Ind., closed a meeting with First Church, Paducah, Ky., lasting two weeks and two days, which resulted in fifty additions to the church. Twenty-four of these were by confession and baptism, twenty-two by church fellowship, and four from other religious bodies. There were sixteen additions on Sunday preceeding the close of meeting on Monday night, and six on Monday night. Every one is delighted with the results of the meeting. The entire church and community have been greatly blessed by it. The pastor, W. A. Fite, says that Doctor Crossfield caught the ear of Puducah as few evangelists have. "He is greatly admired by people of all churches and all the people of Paducah. He relies upon a strong presentation of the gospel at night and energetic personal work through the day for results. His messages are clear, cultured and scriptural. His is an evangelism of sanity and common sense. There is the double appeal to the head and heart and so finely balanced is it that one does not overrule the other but both act in harmony." Prof. Sturgis rendered excellent service, singing his solos effectively, and ably conducting a lage cholr and a children's chorus. Doctor Crossfield secured from five men in the church $2,000 endowment for Transylvania University which gave the First Church a scholarship in the university. Twenty persons in the church also agreed to give $5 per year for five years for the purpose of educating some young man for the ministry who should be selected by the church and go out from the church.

Walter Scott Cook closed his work at Nelsonville, O., Dec. 10, after a fruitful ministry of nearly six years. He began work at Wilkinsburg Church, Pittsburg, last Sunday. The outlook for a fine work there is good. We are assured by those who know that it is one of the finest opportunities in Western Pennsylvania. The spirit in which Mr. Cooks' ministry closed at Nelsonville is indicated by the following beautiful sentiment which he indited to his congregation and printed in the calendar on his last Sunday. It is entitled "The Parting of the Ways" and reads as follows: "For more than five years we have walked down life's pathway together. They have been beautiful years, full of kindness and love. They have gone quickly—too quickly. But what experiences we have had together! Many of you have found the path to God in these years. Indeed we have read the whole chapter of life together—its joys and sorrows, its victories and defeats, its sunshine and its shadow. These years have meant much to us. You have taught us some great lessons. We believe in people now as never before. Whenever we are tempted to doubt again we shall remember you all and faith will come in place of doubt. If we need to think again of love, you will be our thirteenth chapter of I. Corinthians. If we are ever discouraged again, we shall recall your fine appreciation. We came empty handed but we go treasure laden. Your friendship to us is worth more than all the world's gold. Our parting ways shall come together again and in the Father's house we shall have time to cultivate to the full your rich capacity for loving friendship."

At the regular annual meeting of the church in Beatrice, Nebr., reports were received from all the working auxiliaries of the church. The pastor, J. E. Davis, gave a record of 126 sermons. The missionary activities of the church have been larger this year than any previous year in the history of the church, the church having taken on a new obligation in providing the salary of a missionary at work in the United States. The church now supports five missionary teachers besides its own pastor. They are as follows: In 1907 the church took up the support of Dr. Mary Lougdon of Bilaspur, India; in 1908 the support of Dr. James Butchart, Lu Chow Fu, China; in 1909 the support of C. G. Elsam of Bina, India was assumed; in 1910 the support of Mrs. Dr. James Butchart of Lu Chow Fu, China was undertaken. The last work undertaken was during 1911, this last year, when J. W. Baker of West Washington was taken as a missionary of the church. This missionary work is made possible by the devotion and consecration of some of the individual members of the church. In addition to the above, the church and individual members have taken a wide interest in special work on mission fields, covering an expenditure of over $17,000. The pastor reported a net increase in the membership during the last year and many steps taken in the plans of working auxiliaries of the church. He reported that the securing of a pipe organ and the support of a new missionary worker in the west were the two things where the church touched high water mark during the year. The total money given from all sources during the year was $18,400. It is the best report and

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

THE SIGNS INDICATE AN UNPRECEDENTED INCREASE IN VOLUME OF ORDERS FOR THE WINTER QUARTER the best year the church has had in its history.

W. D. Endres reports thirteen additions to the membership of Kirksville, Mo., church in November. They hope to have a new pipe organ installed by Easter.

William Mayfield of Butler, Mo., has accepted a call to West Side Church, Kansas City, Mo., and will begin his ministry there January 1, 1912. The church at Butler has not yet chosen his successor.

Geo. R. Southgate of Calfax, Ill., reports the work progressing nicely. He has just completed a series of twelve sermons on the Book of Romans which had decidely educational adventages for the large congregations in attendance.

Large crowds are hearing Gipsy Smith in his Pacific Coast tour. At present he is in Tacoma, Wash. Nearly 6000 people are hearing him nightly in the tabernacle. The Disciples of Christ are co-operating in the meetings.

Word has reached us of the death of Dr. Laughlin Oneal, of Somerset, Ind. Dr. Oneal united with the Christian church in 1856 and remained a staunch devoted member throughout life. He leaves a widow and three children, one of whom is Dr. Oren Oneal of Memorial Church, Chicago.

The Minges Evangelistic Co. continue in their meeting at Junction City, Kan., with great success. In six days of invitation 230 have been added to the church. Merchants, railroad men and school teachers are among the converts. Walter H. Sandy, J. W. Seniff, Pearl R. Nell, Vida McIntire and Mrs. Minges compose the group of workers.

Evangelists Lockhart and Lintt have conducted two weeks of "decision meetings" with the East End Church, Pittsburg. The pastor, John R. Ewers, heartily commends the evangelists for the earnestness and effectiveness of their work. There were 34 additions as follows: baptisms 23, by relation 11. 147 have been added to the East End church during the ministry of Mr. Ewers.

Christian University, Canton, Mo., has recently been gladdened with two $25,000 legacies, one for a dormitory and the other for a gymnasium. The gymnasium is to be ready for use next September. Pres. Carl Johann writes that if the University had $60,000 more with which to build another dormitory, a central heating plant and a conservatory of music, the building equipment would be practically complete for years to come.

Evangelist Geo. L. Snively has been invited to hold an evangelistic meeting for a Congregational chruch in Indiana. He asks, Will it be rank heresy to serve them?" We should say it would be "rank heresy" to decline their call. The Congregational Church is a church of Christ; its members are Christians, members of the church of Christ. They would undoubtedly leave the evangelist free to speak the truth as he sees it provided only he spoke it in love and not in bigotry. What reader can give a single reason why Mr. Snively should not hold this meeting?

Warren, O., has been enjoying the greatest religious awakening in her history. The churches united in calling the Rev. Milford H. Lyon, D. D. of Wheaton, Ill., and his evangelistic party to lead the campaign. The big tabernacle seating nearly 4,000 has been thronged with great crowds nearly every evening for the past five weeks. Thirteen hundred people have expressed their purpose to begin the Christian life and get right with God. Multitudes of professed Christians have decided for a higher life. Warren people are enthusiastic at the outcome of the campaign there.

The marriage of W. C. MacDougall and Miss Annia Lackey took place at the Mission Bungalow, Jubbulpore, November 10. The marriage ceremony was performed by G. W. Brown and O. J. Grainger, and W. G. Menzies gave the bride away. It was a very quiet wedding, and the newly married couple left the station for a short honeymoon, after which they will take up work in Jubbulpore. It is the privilege of many of the readers of The Christian Century to claim the personal friendship of these missionaries. We congratulate them and wish them long life and joy in the Master's service.

The church at Tipton, Indiana held its second annual men's banquet on Thursday evening, December 7. Prof. W. C. Morro of Butler College and James Burkhardt of Frankfort were the speakers of the evening. Brief messages of greeting were spoken by Bro. B. M. Blount of Indianapolis, the first regular minister of the church, Robert Sellers of Elwood who came to Tipton for his first pastorate, and Aubrey Moore of Arcadia who was for a time a regular supply of the Tipton church. Letters of greeting from L. H. Stine, of Aberdeen, Miss., E. A. Cole of Pittsburg, and H. E. Wilhite of Kansas, former ministers and evangelists of the congregation were read. The ladies of the church served an evening dinner to which exactly two hundred men sat down. These annual dinners mean much in conserving and making for the good fellowship of the church. G. I. Hoover is pastor at Tipton.

At the regular meeting of the St. Louis Christian Ministers Association, Monday December 11, the entire time was given to the discussion of plans for the conservation of the good of the Men and religion Forward Movement. It was the unanimous opinion of the pastors present that the church had received incalculable benefit from the visit of the experts to the city. Plans are being formed in each congregation, and through the co-operation of all the churches, to conserve the good the movement has inaugurated. The secretary was directed to write to all our ministers in the places to be visited by the teams of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, and urge them to give their hearty support to the movement, and also to secure the attendance of all the men and boys in their congregations at every meeting. Those present were, B. A. Abbott, L. M. McCreary, Casper C. Garrigues, Ben N. Mitchell, Mead E. Dutt, Thomas A. Minyard, C. E. Booth, W A. Webster, I. W. Lowman, W. G. Johnston, J. H. Garrison, A. C. Smither, W. R. Warren, R. P. Shepherd.

Sunday-school Report

The offering from the Sunday-school for American Missions continues to come with gratifying increase. Every school from whom we have heard seems to have done its best. In all 900 schools have reported. We are anxious about the 7,000 others from whom we have not heard. We hope many are planning to use one of the remaining Sundays in December for this important matter. Here are comparative statements showing how the states rank:

A New Volume of Sermons

Recently there came to my desk a volume of sermons from the pen of the beloved J. W. Lanham, of Manville, Indiana. The volume is entitled, "Thrilling Themes in Theology." It is issued by the Christian Board of Publication, of St. Louis.

From my earliest years, the author has been held in highest reverence by my people. It is a genuine pleasure to read these sermons.

J. W. Lanham has been in most sympathetic relations with the movement of the Disciples of Christ for more than a half century. For fifty years he has been pastor at Manville. Tied by love and the sense of duty to a rural community in a somewhat isolated section of Indiana, he had nevertheless kept his mind and heart open to the great spiritual forces that are at work in the world at large.

In this volume of sermons, he has sought to interpret Christianity in all loyalty to his Master, and at the same time he holds himself ready to accept the conclusions of the best modern thought. Such sermons as "The Truth," "The Humanity of Christ," "Christian Union Through Christian Unity," show how intensely these two forces have been allowed to play upon his thought. Loyalty to Christ and open-mindedness to all truth from whatever source," seems to have been his life-long motto.

Yet I am not quite convinced that Brother Lanham has fully grasped the revolutionary character of modern thought. There seems to be a dualism in the interpretations of the author which this age is trying its best to resolve—and then is it quite correct to say that Christ was a philosopher, and that "Christ's philosophy was absolutely complete?"—(p. 49.)

Though there are many phrases which cause the hypercritical to question, there is throughout this volume such a manly spirit of earnest appreciation of truth, and such evident faithfulness to duty, that it must be reasoned as one of the genuine contributions to our literature.

A brief biography, by J. P. Rowlison, forms the introduction to the volume, and the author closes his work with a most sympathetic appreciation of the saintly Love H. Jameson.

Here is a most wholesome book for the shelves of the young minister, and a most heartening expression for the more mature minister. It can be secured from the author himself, or from J. P. Rowlison, Tiffin, Iowa, for the modest sum of $1.00.

An Important Conference

The first general gathering of the state and national secretaries of our various church activities, convened last week in St. Louis. For years it has been the habit of these men to banquet together, somewhat informally, at our national conventions. On such occasions no time or opportunity is afforded to consider the work in which each is engaged. Last summer at one of the banquets, at Portland, someone ventured to suggest the good that might come from a three days' conference in the middle of the year, so it was arranged.

Bankers, merchants, stockmen, farmers and teachers gather from the ends of the land to talk over conditions and plan for the welfare of these varied enterprises; why should not our missionary secretaries do the same?

The fellowship of this gathering was unique. Men of kindred spirit to whom are committed by a confiding church the responsibilities of a kingdom extension, met to compare notes, methods and means of service. They were present from "where rolls the Oregon" to the oyster beds of Chesapeake Bay, and from the bleak plains of Montana to the flowered villas of Florida. These state secretaries are accustomed to long rides and much sacrifice for the common good. By unanimous consent these men met, and that "there might be equality" the railroad fares were pooled so that the near-by paid as much for his privileges as the far-distant. This, however, was only an equitable adjustment of the fares, inasmuch as it is for the most part our men on the mission fields where the burdens are heaviest who were compelled to travel the farthest.

Perhaps the subjects considered indicate the importance of the gathering as much as anything. The program included well prepared papers and discussions upon the following themes: "The Publication of a Joint Magazine," by Stephen J. Corey; "General Rules Governing Annuities," by G. W. Muckley; "Our Statistical Problems," by H C. Combs; "Comity Among our Mission-is the new work on religion by EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES which bids fair to be even more generally discussed than the same author's "Psychology of Religious Experience."

The Divinity of Christ

It is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

ary Societies," by J. H. Mohorter; "Closer Relations Between the American Christian Missionary and the State Societies," by L. E. Murray; "The Problems of Unification," by A. B. Philputt; "The Transfer of Church Membership," by C. F. Swander; "The Unworthy Preacher," by J. Fred Jones; "A 'Front Rank' Standard for Churches," by George E. Lyon.

The far reaching consequences of such a gathering can scarcely be estimated. Certain great problems which seemed to be "nobody's business" were assigned to committees for further consideration or execution; thus there is now in progress definite work by committees from whom reports are expected at the next conference regarding various matters indicated by the above mentioned program topics.

Doubtless the greatest problem among the Disciples is how to relate their diverse and independent missionary, benevolent and philanthropic enterprises to each other and to the churches which must be their interested constituency. The promotion of Christian unity by its practice among ourselves is the chiefest concern of our communion. In this conference the representative of each society was made to see his own work in its relation to all the others. The discussion on "Comity Among our Societies" was frank as well as friendly. A spade was called "a spade" and the result is the recognition on every hand that this great work is one, and must be conducted not only in the spirit of brethren, but with the economy, efficiency, system and unity of one great, complete, solidified, successful business enterprises of the kingdom. To this end especially did the evening with the committee on "Unification," the discussion of "Comity Among Societies," and the presentation of "A Uniform Missionary Plan" contribute. So helpful did the gathering prove to all present that plans were laid looking toward a like convocation in the mid-winter season of next year.

Notes from the Foreign Society

O. G. Hertzog's visit to China and the other mission fields has been a real blessing to the missionaries and the missionary work. His experienced business eye enabled him to see the real situation at once. He entered sympathetically into the problems of the missionaries and helped them in many ways. Wherever he went the hearts of the workers were cheered. The good influence of his visit will abide many years to come. At the last report he was in Jubbulpore, India.

Cheering reports are being received from Foreign Missionary Rallies in different parts of the country. President McLean with missionaries Erskine of Japan and McGavran of India are in the Central Southern states and Secretary E. W. Allen with Dr. Jaggard, of Africa, and H. P. Shaw, of China, is in the East.

Mrs. Stella Walker Lewis, a returned missionary from Japan, is visiting a number of churches and wherever she goes she creates a larger and deeper interest for the work.

The Social Work of Christian Missions, by Alva W. Taylor, is receiving much commendation. A number have said it is one of the strongest missionary volumes ever written. It is a well bound, tasteful volume of 264 pages, well illustrated. The price is 50 cents, postage ten cents extra.

C. P. Hedges has just returned on his first furlough from the Congo. He reports splendid advances in the work. Just before he left for America, a union conference of all the Protestant Congo missions was held at Bolenge. There were forty missionaries in attendance. The excellent work of our mission received high praise from all. During the conference the new church building at Bolenge was dedicated and 192 converts were baptized in one day.

During the revolutionary troubles in Nankin, China, our missionaries are all staying in Shanghai. There is a great congestion of foreigners there from the whole Yangtse River Valley. Four families are living in one home in Shanghai, but there is no complaint. It is hoped that things will have quieted sufficiently soon so that mission work can be resumed in the interior.

John Johnson, Nantungchow, China, referring to the present trouble in China, says: "The revolution which is spreading so rapidly over the empire with comparatively little bloodshed will injure and retard the Lord's work for a short time, but eventually we feel confident it will produce conditions favorable to the growth of the work.

Bruce L. Kershner, Manila, Philippine Islands, reports seven baptisms and 143 in the Sunday-school at the mission house. He states also that our property in the Philippine Islands is valued at $24,750. There is great need of more property.

C. E. Robinson, Sendai, Japan, reports one baptism at Fukushima.

Last week the Foreign Society received $500 bequest from the estate of Mrs. Eliza Ayres, Wauseon, Ohio. Large numbers of members of the Christian Church should remember the regions beyond in their last will and testament.

For the first two months of the current missionary year there has been a gain in the reguar receipts of $1,489.95. However, there is a loss in the annuities of $4,835. There has been a gain of forty-eight contributing churches and 117 contributing Sunday-schools. The churches, as churches, have contributed $1,418 more than for the corresponding two months last year and the Sunday-schools have increased their gifts $659.59.

F. M. RAINS, Secretary.

An Important Statement of Facts

If you are interested in the efficiency and success of the organized benevolent work of the Christian Churches, you will be interested in this statement of facts.

Many inquiries have been received lately regarding the Mothers' and Babies' Home and Christian Hospital, of St. Louis. The fact that these institutions now have no connection whatever with the National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church, does not seen to be clearly understood.

On account of the prolonged dissatisfaction with the character and manner of conducting the work of the Mothers' and Babies' Home and Christian Hospital, the central executive board of the association, out of consideration for the welfare of the work under its care and in justice to the people who are supporting it, felt compelled to insist upon a change in the character of the work being done by these institutions and in their method of doing it. Therefore, at a meeting of the central executive board of the association, held on April 20, nineteen out of twenty-one members of the board resident in St. Louis, voted that these changes must be made; whereupon Mrs. T. R. Ayars, and some others, removed the inmates and furniture of the Christian hospital, wards and property of the association, from the building rented from Mrs. Ayars. Later she organized the Christian Woman's National Benevolent Association, through which she is now appealing for support for these institutions. It has been repeatedly stated in the papers of St. Louis, that these institutions are wholly non-sectarian and undenominational. However this may be, neither the Mothers' and Babies' Home nor the Christian Hospital of St. Louis is now in any way connected with the National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church. Mrs. T. R. Ayars has no connection whatever with the Association or with any of its institutions.

The question is being asked, "What about the care of mothers and babies in St. Louis?" When the new building of the Christian Orphans' Home was erected, a portion of it was designed and constructed with special reference to the need of babies. Mothers and babies are now being received and cared for by it, receiving better service at less cost by far than they received in a separate institution. The Christian Orphans' Home has under its care, from fifteen to twenty-five babies, and as many mothers. It is not now necessary to separate families. The standard of service has been raised and the expense reduced at least one-third.

Note.—The Association has no home for the aged in St. Louis: First, because we have no need for it. There is plenty of room in the Dallas Home.

Second—We have all the Homes we are able to support at present.

Benevolent Association News Notes.

The Association has just received another annuity from a good sister who believes in investing her money with the Lord. Last year was the association's best annuity year, and from the present indications the present financial year will surpass the gratifying record of last year.

The association has its very best annual report on the press. It will be out in a few days. While the gain in new money over records of previous years was not large, it was substantial, indicating decided growth and interest in its work. The gain over last year was $17,821.21. Notwithstanding this gain the association has had a hard year financially, for the reason that it has had an unusually large family under its care and the living expenses have been abnormally high.

Two of our homes for the aged, Jacksonville and East Aurora, with a family of fifty-eight, are in sore need of financial help. The old people in these homes were not picked up from anywhere and everywhere, but were sent to the homes by the churches and were received at the request of the churches. Surely our brethren mean to make generous provision for their aged, honored, indigent members.

The general secretary has just returned from a trip to the Southern Convention, which netted in cash and good pledges over $1,500. This is an indication of the substantial interest of the southern people in the Southern Christian Orphanage at Atlanta. The generosity of our Southern brethren to our benevolent work is refreshing and encouraging.

Our Southern Home at 299 Lee St., Atlanta, is in excellent hands. The leaders in all of our churches in the city almost to a man and woman, are giving of their time and thought and money freely for our home. T. Olin Hathcock, a prominent young attorney in the Equitable Building, is its president.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The Graded Lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' and Primary Departments are fully completed. Three of the four Junior grades are complete. Fourth year Junior pupils may use either third year Junior lessons or first year Intermediate. Two of the four Intermediate grades are complete, and these materials may be used for the entire Intermediate Department. For Senior and Adult Departments, Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus" is provided. Other Adult classes may use Dr. Strong's "The Gospel of the Kingdom."]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

EVERY LESSON WRITER IS A RECOGNIZED AUTHORITY IN THE INTERDENOMINATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL WORLD!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that co-operation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

The Best

Did you know that the Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 will be in The Life of Christ? That means that you will want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition has just been issued to meet the great demand expected this fall. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

Prayer

It is natural for one who has watched the growth of the scientific spirit in the church to ask whether in this new order of thought which dominates our present age, prayer has the same significance it once possessed. Has it not been outgrown as ineffective and useless? What place is there for petition and thanksgiving in a universe which is ruled by law? Is God personal enough to hear and answer prayer? Or have the saints of all the centuries been mistaken regarding the power and privilege of this experience of the inner life?

It may hardly be said that marked changes have come over thought of the church regarding prayer. It would be impossible to accept the results of scientific study and of research into the workings of the human mind without perceiving that some modification of former views is inevitable. The removal of inadequate interpretations of prayer must precede any satisfactory definition of this great privilege in the Christian life.

Certainly prayer is no mere repetition of pious words. There was a time when it was believed that the utterance of a form of speech prepared by gifted leaders was sufficient to secure the privileges of the holy life. Hence the forms of prayer used in the church as well as in private devotion. And hence, also, arose the custom of repeating many times over certain forms of prayer such as the Pater Noster, the Ave Maria, and the Gloria. It is true that a very considerable body of Christians even still regard these exercises as essential to the cultivation of piety. One may not deny the efficacy of even the most formal and repetitious use of customary and time-honored petitions while yet he perceives that these do not even approach the art and joy of real praying. In so far as any form of prayer, even the Lord's Prayer, detracts from essential communion with God, it is a hindrance rather than an aid.

It is equally clear that prayer cannot be intended by intelligent Christians as an effort to change the purpose of God in the moral or physical order of the world. A moment's reflection would show that such a theory would involve hopeless confusion in the administration of providential ministries through the conflict of contending petitioners. To be sure there may be at first a sense of comfort in the belief that God hears and answers prayer in the same manner that a parent might accede to the request of a child. But this is too limited a conception of the subject, and yields only slight comfort even to the most wistful soul. It leaves the universe open too much to the play of caprice and serves no useful moral end. Prayer must be a larger function than this, and cannot be supposed to serve as a force to interfere in the gracious ends of God's providence.

Nor, on the other hand, is prayer a mere pious exercise. There are those in our day who tell us that in a universe of law there is no one to hear, and therefore prayer cannot be addressed to any listening Father, but is merely the practice of devout thoughts and exercises for its subjective value in Christian experience. Such a value it unquestionably has. No one can doubt that the practice of prayer, even if there were no hearing God, would be of great value in the development of the inner life. But how far short this definition falls of meeting the requirements of the Christian life! And how little does it correspond with the experience of Jesus, whose intimacy with the Father was the supreme passion of his life. Prayer is no mere pious gymnastic.

More positively, then, prayer is the communion of the devout soul with the Infinite. It is the perception of the possibility of relationship with God. It is the entrance of the human spirit into comradeship with the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is the cultivation of the eternal friendship which is possible to the reverent and growing life. It is the use of the truest means of approach to the heart of the universe. It is the arousal of the soul to participation in the divine activity. It is the speech of the spirit with the Highest.

Nor is this Eternal a mere idea. To satisfy the need of the child there must be personal relationship with the father, and the father himself must be personal. Even so our Father who is in heaven is personal. Here one must walk with quiet steps, for the theme is not easily approached, since personality, even on the human plane, is so mysterious and baffling a problem. Who knows himself among the conflicting urgencies that claim his regard and assume to control his conduct! Into the abysses of personality one looks with a certain apprehension which the study of psychology in its later phases does not remove. We seem to be standing only, as yet, upon the threshold of a mysterious domain, and beyond the threshold there are many dwellers, dim shapes of whose purpose and power it is difficult as yet to speak. How, then, with this complex of problems in the study of our human personality, can we affirm any sweeping pronouncement regarding the personal God?

Yet less than personal He is not, though how much more we cannot know. To the saints of all the years He has been a living and vital presence. To our Lord He was the source of deep and abiding comfort. We, as pilgrims of the inner way, may trust the path where the greater spirits have walked. And our own experience of God, when life is yielded unhesitatingly to his call, holds confirmatory proof which we cannot question.

Prayer is the source of power and of joy. The men who have wrought most potently for the enrichment of humanity and the conquest of evil have been the men of prayer. Were there no other proof of its efficacy, this should be convincing. It is the source of joy, for He who lives at the altitude of prayer is above the mist and fog of the lower earth and has the privilege of living serene and undismayed with the great souls who have achieved the higher life.

And prayer is answered, not in the small dimensions of personal petitions, nor even in the sweeping demands of pious but unthinking enthusiasts who organize prayer tests and often jeopardize the faith of thousands by such foolish efforts to try God. But prayer is answered. It is answered on the lowest plane of definite and persistent human purpose. The soul that sets itself resolutely to the achievement of an ideal wins in the end. There is a victorious quality in calm and convinced persistence. And this is precisely what prayer means. When one has opened his soul to God in earnest request for some great good, he has already half won it, and he has the assurance that all the forces of the universe are set like time-clocks to the release of the spiritual values that assist him in his enterprise. Personal blessings and public benefits are alike secured by the power of prevailing prayer. For the Father only waits the coöperation of his prayerful children to bestow these very blessings which it is His desire to give, but which He cannot confer apart from their urgent and persistent seeking.

Therefore prayer is finding for itself a new and larger place in the regard of the informed and purposeful Christian of today. It has lost some of its lesser and traditional values as life has moved up from conventional to vital levels. But it has also vastly widened its horizon and is seen to be a power incapable of mere capricious use but set to the achievement of the greatest purposes with which the spiritual life can concern itself. And these may well include all those smaller benefits of health, prosperity and rewarded service for which we have been taught to pray. Lifted to the higher plane, they are seen to be the objects for whose achievement the human spirit seeks the coöperation of the divine. And thus sought, they cannot elude ultimate possession.

Ten Hour Day for Women

The past year a ten hour law was passed in Illinois for the protection of the women workers of the state. It was opposed at first by many manufacturers and even by some women workers. The latter were afraid they would lose their positions to men if they were hedged in with legal restrictions. The law has now been in operation for several months and its beneficent results are already becoming apparent. But few women have been replaced by men for they have made themselves secure in industrial life by developing skill in certain employments beyond that possible for men. The deftness of women's fingers will make them survive in the work of the typewriter, the seamstress and in other occupations where such deftness is serviceable. Other qualities equally safe-guard their interests. The protection to women is especially apparent in the heart of the shopping season. Girls who served their employers for twelve to fifteen hours a day through this busy season last year are spared that nightmare this year. The employer must secure more help. He must educate the public to do their shopping in reasonable hours. All this makes it possible for the girl behind the counter to look forward this year to a real Christmas, instead of sleeping through the day in utter exhaustion.

Mob Law and Barbarism

A good deal of learned labor has been spent upon the subject of mob psychology. It is well known that many of us will act under the influence of a crowd in a way that we should never do when in a reflective mood. The conduct of some staid old professor at a football game is a humorous example in point. The mob violence by which criminals are executed in this country, north and south, is the most important example of the mob spirit, and because so destructive of all civilized means, we should undertake to understand it. Mob violence is the return of the primitive. We are all savages, held in check by the inhibitions of our civilized life. Because we have been civilized so few centuries relatively, the "natural" is the primitive. Civilization is not yet native to our souls. We must consciously struggle to maintain what we have gained through civilized life, or relapse into barbarian habits. The worst of our infidelities, almost, is to doubt our civilized standards for that is to doubt the God of Progress.

What happens in the souls of the mis-guided men who compose the ordinary mob, is that in their sober moments they have allowed themselves to doubt civilization. They have secretly hankered after the spectacular and direct methods by which justice was administered in the early tribes. There are to be found in almost all communities, men who will soberly discuss certain exigencies under which they feel that mob violence would be right. There are even governors who condone the mob after it has done its awful work, and all this makes for the moment when the community starts on a man hunt and takes the law into its own hands. There will be attempts at mob violence as long as men are skeptical about civilization. There will be mob violence so long as men do not build walls around their inherited barbarism. Let us have no disguises. So long as men are executed without a trial, there are still many among us who would be more at home in an Indian's tepee than in the white man's house.

The Labor of Children

It is one of the marks of our advancing civilization that so many states in the union have already passed child labor laws which prohibit the labor of children in most occupations below a certain age. The exceptions to this rule furnish us with a worthy task still. The violation of these laws demands of us vigilance in securing their enforcement. A magazine tells of the woes of the children oyster shuckers of the South, and of the children who prepare the shrimps for the canning. These children are working for as low a wage as five cents a day. They are the children of Polish workmen who have been imported from the North with glowing promises, and living in homes where the low wages of the adults makes the labor of the children necessary. While the story of acid attacking the hands of these children, and of a company of men being lost at sea on a scow, is appealing, yet the worst evil of all is to be found where the parents, through sloth, do not work with the children, but are content to live off of them. In the cotton mills of the South, and even in our neighboring state of Indiana, it is possible to find groups of children running great machines in the manufacture of thread. These children miss many things. They miss the sweet experiences of childhood, which furnish us with the happy memories that keep us from utter despair in the hardships of later life. The very play they miss is a part of their proper education, socializing the children and teaching them many of the finer lessons in life. The child that works in the factory when he ought to be in school is condemned to live ever from the products of unskilled hands. To work a child of school age is to sell him to economic slavery from which the coming man is never likely to be emancipated.

What Shall We Do with the Men?

There is a wide-spread feeling among the churches that the church has grown feminine and that it is losing its grip on men. So definite has this conviction become that we are now in the midst of various efforts to bring the men back again into relation with the life of the church. This alienation of men has sometimes been charged to the critical spirit of the age. While it is true that men think more freely than formerly about religious matters, it is noteworthy that the old-time blatant infidel has well nigh disappeared. Our men are almost universally believers in the broader religious faith, as one may discover by examining the creed of the lodges, expressed in their rituals and resolutions, or by discussing religious matters with the various kinds of men. Men are less inclined to skepticism than ever before in the history of America, and more inclined to leave the church. Why? This is a matter to give all loyal churchmen pause.

The various movements are expressing the conviction that the men have been alienated from the church for the lack of a man's job in the church. The brotherhood movement, the Men and Religion Movement, the Laymen's Missionary Movement, these all have given emphasis to the social element in religion and have undertaken to show men that the real work of religion is to improve the conditions of human living. It is the express point of view of the prophets of our age that the church has lost men for the lack of the social program in the church. It is noteworthy that men in churches which have no social program, are apt to take more interest in missions than in the home church. It is because missions furnish the element lacking in the local program. The tasks lying near at hand for our men to do themselves, not to hire done, are many. The opportunity of helping the boys is a task socially significant. The improvement of local politics, the inauguration in the municipality, of the newer methods of doing things, these and a thousand other tasks lie at hand to be done and the church that will incorporate these in her program will have no lack of men.

An Epoch-Marking Document

The survey of the results of the "Billy" Sunday revival at Springfield, Ill., in last week's Christian Century by Dr. Morrison is an epoch-marking document. It has significance for the whole Protestant church in America. The analysis of results is carried out in a scientific and judicial spirit, but the whole survey brings home to us as never before the emptiness of this antiquated way of propagating religion. From the standpoint of our social interest we are delighted to see the test of efficiency applied to religious methods. Dr. Morrison would test these methods by their social product. It was the point of view of our Teacher who said, "By their fruits ye shall know them." Religion is not a little compartment of life where are filed away our other-worldly interests. It is the function of religion to interpret life and God and destiny to the individual and by so doing to relate him more fraternally to his fellows. A religious method that does not yield this product stands condemned before the world. Dr. Morrison has pointed out that vital religious interest has not been quickened at Springfield through the revival. The great tasks of the church have not gone forward. The money that went so lavishly into the Sunday revival might have armed the church to meet the needs of their poor. It might have educated twenty young ministers. It would have equipped magnificently a mission station. The Christian enthusiasm that exploded itself in the Sunday revival might have stormed and taken some great citadel of evil if intelligently directed. This fire of enthusiasm might have burned more gently and furnished the steam for pastoral and personal evangelism that would have made men and women citizens of the kingdom instead of mere nominal church members. Against the waste and inefficiency of modern professional revivalism we make our protest.

Hon. Seth Low on Unity

The Episcopalians are still discussing, with great ability, the subject of Christian union. The Living Church gives us an excerpt of a strong address by the former mayor of New York City. Mr. Low is a warden of St. George's Church in that city. Like all who ever consider this subject, he is painfully aware of the loss caused by our unhappy divisions. Maybe our intense denominationalism will be the cause of our conversion to the doctrine of Christian union at last. Here is the case in a nutshell. "There is a loosening hold of the Christian church in the small community due to a terrific waste of men and money in trying to support four skeleton churches where only one strong one is needed." What he says of the ministry is equally worthy of our study. Hear him:

"If in the time of King James one English Bible was made out of eight translations, one church can be made today out of all existing communions. We all know how widely different is the conception of the ministry. I think I can be frank to say that it is impossible for men to agree on the conception of the ministry. But we can make a minister whom everybody will accept. Suppose in the ministry of the future, say all ordained after the year 1920, an Episcopal Bishop, a Presbyterian, a Methodist, a Baptist, and a representative of other communions should take part, then all would accept the clergyman thus ordained. The process could be carried on just as far as is practical. The question arises as to what you are going to do with the men already ordained. Well, you could get them reordained. It would be possible to care for existing ministers and ultimately to get a ministry that would be recognized universally. See what we suffer because we don't get together as churches. There is a loosening hold of the Christian church in the small community due to a terrific waste of men and money in trying to support four skeleton churches where only one strong one is needed. See what we lose in our big cities by being broken up. The church ought to be so strong that we could go to her for the support of all moral issues instead of going to outside philanthropic organizations. Think of the different denominations trying to carry the gospel to China. How much better to have one church which would reach from the Quaker to Rome. Christianity will not be able to exercise itself much longer unless these movements for Christian unity make progress."

Two Dangers of Baptists

Dr. J. B. Gambrell as quoted in The Baptist World, sounds an alarm to his brethren, which has a familiar ring to the readers of some Disciple periodicals. He says:

"The danger is that some Baptists will, in their joy, take softening of the brain and quit the simple truth for which our fathers have suffered and died, and run off to meet those coming our way."

Following this example, the editor adds another warning. He fears that his brethren will have hardening of the heart. He says:

"Some other Baptists, in their joy, will not wisely and sympathetically handle those 'coming our way.' We must be willing to let them come without too great humiliation; let them come 'saving their faces,' if that be possible, without any sacrifice of principle."

To us who are accustomed to threnodies of this kind, there is nothing new or startling; but they serve to show that no organization has a monopoly on "the simple truth," and that all parties not only cherish the hope that others are "coming their way," but are ready to announce their approach. In view of this vocabulary which all alike use, expressing their hopes and fears while victory is still deferred, it is really wonderful that all sects have not rushed into each other's arms long ago!

One of the Costliest Churches in America

There seems no tendency on the part of our Episcopalian brethren to economize in the matter of church buildings. They agree to the doctrine of a sagacious Englishman, quoted by Bishop David H. Greer, in his address at the laying of the cornerstone of St. Thomas', in New York City last month, that "it is ever a fateful sign of art decaying into luxury, and religion into contempt, when men permit the House of God to be meaner than their own, or when they allow to their domestic pleasures what they do not allow to their collective worship." The church will cost $1,000,000; the furnishings $500,000; and the land on which it is erected is worth $1,500,000. The Living Church, in giving an account of this occasion, says, quoting Dr. Ernest M. Stires, rector of the parish:

"The problem of the great East side and West side will be ours. The problem of the less than living wage with its resulting waves of vice and crime, and the problem of disease, it will be our duty to help solve as never before." And again at the centenary of St. George's, Bishop Greer said: "One hundred years ago, it [St. George's] was a family church with rented pews; it is now the people's church, whether they are rich or poor . . . A sociological Gospel, yes, but a sociological Gospel, not with Jesus Christ out of it, but with Jesus Christ in it. That is what St. George's hands forth."

Comparing these three detached utterances, we have admirably stated the perspective that should govern in the building of church edifices and the maintenance of parish work. St. Thomas' parish, composed, in considerable part, of men of great wealth, would insult Almighty God if they should dedicate to His worship a mean and contemptible edifice, on a side street! but they would insult Him still more grossly if they should use their magnificent edifice as only an exclusive Sunday club house for themselves. The worship of God stands first as the duty of the church, and no work for humanity can detract from that first duty. But worship degenerates into hyprocrisy if it does not lead to the service of humanity as an inevitable effect. That is why Doctor Stires' thought of the problems of less than a living wage, of vice and crime and disease, grows with inexorable logic out of the theme of the righteousness of erecting costly edifices for divine worship. And the same thought is that which Bishop Greer so well brought out in his contrast between a "family church" and a "people's church" at St. George's, a "sociological Gospel" with Jesus Christ left out and one with Him as the dominating force.

Troubled Over Louisville's Dedication

While we are speaking of church buildings, we wish to remind Doctor Powell, and the brethren at Louisville, that they must not be exalted above measure, or they will rejoice as those who had run in vain. Yea, while they rejoice there is weeping in the land and while they exult, there is groaning and deep sorrow. The Gospel Advocate is not at all pleased over the proceedings. Colonel Watterson's presence at the dedication was not in order; and the invitation of the secretary and treasurer of the Christian Widows' and Orphans' Home of Kentucky, a member of the congregation, to neighboring churches to join in a Thanksgiving day service, in the big new church, and hear the big organ, vexes it sorely. It says:

"While Colonel Watterson, a man of the world, observes the "dissonance" between all of this [display] and "in the name of the lowly attributes of the Nazarene," well may we say with the weeping Mary: "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him."

After laying the program of the week's dedicatory exercises before its readers, it says:

"Here, in this dedicatory program, is not only a frank and open acknowledgement that it is a denomination, with the fact printed and published to the world, but it provides for a regular denominational hotchpotch on Tuesday evening, a kind of convivial interdenominational feast."

Shame on you, Brother Powell, for mingling with the uncircumcized Philistines, and entangling your tongue with the speech of Ashdod, and allowing your ears to be ravished with the music of that twelve thousand dollar organ!

—Dr. Jowett, of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, is not only effective in the pulpit, but in the prayer-meeting as well, as witnessed by the following: The prayer-meeting room seats about 400. Wednesday night, Nov. 22, there were not more than twenty-five empty places. This prayer-meeting of Dr. Jowett's is attracting interest all over the city and suburbs. There are always many ministers present. Dr. Jowett is now giving a course of talks on "The Beatitudes." The morning of Nov. 19, some 200 persons were turned away from Fifth Avenue Church because there was no room to seat them. The church seats 1,900.

—The international committee of the Y. M. C. A. has asked John R. Mott to become the associate general secretary of both the home and foreign departments, taking the place of Clarence J. Hicks, resigned, who was connected with the home work. Heretofore Mr. Mott has devoted his time to the foreign department alone.

—For the first time since its organization in 1810, the Congregational Board of Foreign Missions' income exceeded the million dollar mark, the total receipts being $1,032,025. This great record we are informed, is due to the 5,000 or more Congregationalists, who, during the last two months of the year, sent individual gifts, for the most part, in addition to the offerings they had already made through the local churches.

First Things First

It is implied in the statement of this week's topic, that every one of us ought to know what is worth while. An intelligent person owes it to himself and to others that he examine himself and his environment with a view to learning how to employ his energies most profitably. We easily fall into the habit of doing things that might just as well be left undone. As Christians we must ask whether the activities of the church are religiously significant. As citizens we may properly inquire whether the issues which absorb our interest are really as important as we have felt them to be.

Time is wasted when first things are crowded out of the first place in our efforts. We are all complaining that we have too little time for the work demanded of us. Let us sit down and try to plan the work of the year as it would be if we kept steadily before us the things that intelligence and conscience command. Some of us may have to attend fewer religious meetings and withdraw from several organizations with which we are connected. We may have to strain ourselves to say we have not read the popular book of the hour, and that we have no intention of reading it. If our social relations were made vital and not formal there would be a saving of time.

There would be less talk about soul culture if we gave heed to the invitation to seek first the kingdom. We grow by doing good deeds and by occupying our minds with great ideas. Bible study is a means of grace, if we put the central teachings of the Bible in the center of our thinking. But if we undertake to group the facts of the Bible about some theory, the more we study the less capable are we of grappling with the serious problems of daily experience.

The ability to see what is essential in a given situation and the habit of brushing aside barriers of custom and prejudice and of going at the main issue, will win for us the kind of friends we need. By emphasizing continually minor virtues and by denouncing on every occasion the minor faults of men, we destroy their confidence in our judgment. If we have to engage in political or religious battles with our neighbors, we ought to be able to make it appear that we have some knowledge of religion and politics, and that our quarrels are not about trifles. The church that stops its work to engage in a fight over questions of personal taste and ambition must expect sensible people to be indifferent to its pronouncements concerning the way of salvation. The world is not unreasonable in looking for signs of sanity and fairness in the conduct of professional disciples of Jesus.

The teachers in our schools try to show us that we cannot get very far along in our thinking unless we group our ideas about the fundamental idea of a lesson or a science. The value of subordinate facts and truths is brought out by such grouping. This method does full justice to every idea. Here is a suggestion for the religious life. We do not fall into the habit of ignoring details just because we have discovered the truth that includes all other truths. Love of country inculdes love of individual citizens. But we know better the worth of a man when we think of him as a citizen. We take away all meaning from the life of the individual if we try to separate him from his kind.

I think we are to understand that Jesus, in saying all things men have a right to have would be added to them if they sought the kingdom first, meant that men would have to put the kingdom first in order that they might know what they ought to have. He certainly did not mean that it would not be necessary for his disciples to get their bread by honest toil and by intelligent provision for the future. However useful Christian faith and steadfastness may be in the business world, Jesus never intended that they should be merely financial assets. A state that is fully Christian will take thought for the health and comfort of its people. And a Christian man will take thought for the health and comfort of himself and his family. But these will not be the supreme objects of his endeavor. There are some things for which he will surrender health and even life itself. He will not pray for daily bread and then go out and try to get the fruits of other men's labor without giving them the reward due them for their service. He will not judge men by the amount of wealth they possess, but by their manner of getting wealth, and by the returns they make to society for the benefits they receive. He does not judge the church by the eloquence of its preachers, or the number of its meetings by the kind of men it produces. [Midweek Services, Jan. 3. Matt. 6:33;13:44-46.]

The Meaning of Baptism

XIII—THE BAPTISM OF JESUS.

The acceptance of baptism by Jesus at the hands of John interprets the meaning of the ordinance even more clearly than does its rejection by the Pharisees. He accepted it for precisely the same reason that they rejected it. Both he and they understood it as an act of initiation into a new order, a social movement. Neither he nor they regarded it as an individualistic act assumed to possess some intrinsic sacramental virtue. Its meaning was not in itself but in the movement with which it allied each man who submitted to it. Had the baptism of John been a detached institution, standing in its own right and finding its meaning either in itself as an ordinance or in the individual who was baptized, the attitude of both Jesus and the Pharisees would most likely have been exactly contrary to that which they did assume. That is to say, the Pharisees would have been willing to receive it and Jesus could not have received it. The Pharisees rejected John's baptism because they rejected John's movement of which it was the initiating rite. Jesus accepted John's baptism because he wished to enter and be a participant in John's order of penitent men. It was neither the reception of a sacrament nor submission to the physical act of immersion to which the Pharisees recoiled; they were unwilling to be identified with John's movement, his order. It was neither a mere sacrament nor a specific physical act which Jesus accepted in accepting baptism at John's hands; he simply wished to identify himself with John's religious movement and he allowed John to induct him into it.

One of the most curious pieces of biblical interpretation is afforded us in the conventional attempt to account for the baptism of Jesus. John's baptism was a baptism of repentance. But why should one be baptized who had no sin of which to repent? What could baptism have meant to the unstained conscience of Jesus of Nazareth? Various answers are given. One of these gives the baptism a messianic significance: Jesus chose to be baptized in order to formally announce his Messiahship, to inaugurate his redemptive ministry. This, however, is purely fanciful. There is not a suggestion of scripture to justify it. That the baptism was providentially used as the occasion of his self-disclosure is evident, but that it was so intended by Jesus when he came to John there is no hint. It is an unnecessary straining of the event to make it mean something unique in the purpose of this one candidate. It attributes to the mind of Jesus an official and formal cast which his subsequent ministry and experience do not bear out. Whatever is to be said about his later consciousness, it is clearly much easier to interpret his messianic thought at this state in ethical, spiritual and filial terms than in legal and official terms.

Another explanation of the baptism of Jesus is that he submitted to immersion in order to set his future disciples an example. This interpretation is naive and artificial. It assumes a sort of dramatic consciousness in Jesus, that he was acting a part before men, rather than living a real, human life. No act of Jesus was purely exemplary. To him, of all men, every act had a moral motive rooted in his own experience. He would be the last to ask his followers to imitate any specific act of his; what he wished of his followers was that they should imitate him in always relating their actions to moral motives that connected vitally with their own experience. The core of his ethical message was the emancipation of men's souls from every kind of slavish imitation whatsoever. It misrepresents Jesus to interpret his baptism as a mere dramatic pose.

Still another interpetation is the legalistic. This view professes to be based upon Jesus' reply to John's remonstrance: "Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." In this view the physical act of immersion is conceived as a divine command and submission to it was therefore an act of righteousness on Jesus' part. This text is used as the pillar and support of the crassest legalism. Here plainly the spiritual experience usually associated with baptism, namely repentance, is not present. The legalist feels that he is dealing therefore with the sheer abstract physical act of immersion and he finds Jesus submitting to this physical act "in order to fulfil all righteousness." Immersion, therefore, he argues, is a moral act. And this submission of Jesus to it binds immersion upon all his followers as a moral duty.

How the divine authority for this particular physical act was communicated the legalist does not say. The Jews did not regard this form as of divine origin; they derived it not from their Scriptures but from custom or rabbinical regulation. Certainly John never calls attention to immersion as of especial divine sanction. He claims no authority for it whatsoever. He simply practises it. This legalistic view that the saying of Christ refers to immersion as a fulfilment of all righteousness is based, therefore, upon a sheer assumption. The legalist must first find a "thus saith the Lord" for immersion before he can expect his dogma based upon this text to be received by the Christian world.

The fallacy in all these views lies in the fact that baptism is considered apart from its concrete social situation, as an abstract and independent institution with its meaning in itself. When we look at John's ordinance in its actual social connection we see it as an auxiliary institution rendering service in a religious order of penitent men which the prophet was organizing. For men whose consciences were quickened into repentance by John's preaching the baptism was simply the act of joining his movement. It involved no more mystery in the case of Jesus who was without sin than in the case of a pharisee or a publican. To him the baptism meant precisely the same as to them. There is no need whatever of making the baptism of Jesus unique. Instead of being unique it was an act in which our Savior sought to identify himself with his fellows, to do what they were doing, to pass through the same initiation into the freemasonry of men who were seeking to do the righteous will of God. The meaning of his baptism is not found in the baptism, but in the spiritual freemasonry into which the Baptist was urgnetly calling all men. The fact that Jesus' baptism was not a baptism of repentance affects not one whit the meaning of the baptism, though it does lend to his membership in the messianic community a unique graciousness. He was baptized because he wished to become a member of John's community of disciples, he wished to put himself in the position of a follower of John because he believed John's movement was the enterprise of God. His baptism, therefore, had no reference to his own individual experience of sin or sinlessness, nor to any divine authority sanctioning the physical act of immersion; it was, on his part, a moral act of self-identification with John's movement, the contribution of his personality to a social community whose ideal was evidently inspired of God; and as such it was truly an act of righteousness and grace.

If we go back to Nazareth and approach the baptism of our Savior from his point of view, the interpretation we have set forth in the foregoing paragraphs will take on verisimilitude. It is by no means a matter of mere conjecture to trace out the mental pathway which the thoughts of Jesus traversed in the period immediately preceding and including his baptism.

There are three points at which the scripture story discloses to us the secrets of Jesus' inner life at this period. Given these points, it is not difficult to determine the curve and direction of his mind. One of these is the fragmentary reference to his life at Nazareth, which tells us that he grew in wisdom as well as in stature, and in favor with God and man. Another is the account of his temptation in the wilderness, which discovers to us the struggle of his soul to define just what sort of a Messiah he should be. Lying between these two is the baptism, with its disclosure of the divine confirmation to his soul of his messianic character.

Taking the narrative as it stands, it seems evident that the baptism was the occasion when this fact was inescapably revealed. Here at the Jordan, when he had been baptized, the Voice spoke to him and perhaps to John, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. It is hardly probable that this disclosure was a sudden surprise to the soul of Jesus; it was more like a decisive confirmation of years of reflection and wonder and communion with God.

If we take the plain statement of scripture concerning Jesus' growth in wisdom at its face value, we will raise no question concerning his growth in messianic wisdom as well as other wisdom. There was a time when Jesus did not know himself as the Messiah. Later there comes a moment when he does know beyond peradventure that he is the Messiah, the Son of God. That this fact, fully declared at his baptism, had been gradually emerging in his consciousness through the years there can be no doubt. Here in the growing consciousness of our Lord is a field for legitimate exploration by the disciple who possesses the mind of the Master, whose imagination is sensitive, quickened by reflection upon the more clearly revealed facts of Jesus' life and especially by his most significant utterances.

None save the most reverent pen may essay to tell how the divine Spirit first awakened the messianic idea in the soul of Mary's son; by what suggestions the possibility that he might be Messiah came to be entertained by him; how this possibility passed into vague wonder and from wonder into a clear, earnest question: Am I he?; how one day he dared to answer this question with a timid yes, an affirmation which he tolerated only to fling it immediately away before its blasphemy should burn his heart; how his sensitive, agitated soul must have many times doubted its own sanity on account of this persistent, inescapable question; how the affirmation returned again and again—in his mother's presence, at the reading of some great prophet's message, at his bench or on the lilied hillside where he liked to go for solitude and prayer. To trace out the psychical process through which our Savior passed as he gradually awoke to the fact of his divine mission may not be possible as a task of detailed description, but as a task of spiritual appreciation it is possible.

Of this we are sure, that the long, long struggle between the audacity of the divine promptings and the natural humility and shyness of his soul brought him at last to a calm commitment of himself to God, to do His will, to await His leading and to hope for some unmistakable token of the Father's pleasure in him. It was as if in one of those night-long prayers to which he was accustomed, he had said to his Father: "Thou seemest to call me to be the redeemer of thy people. I cannot escape thy Spirit. I will no longer contend against thy promptings. I will do thy will, O God. I will try to be thy Son. I give myself to thee. If thou canst fulfill the expectations of thy people in me, if prophet's foretelling, if thine own foreordaining, may find their answer in me, I will try. Yea, if thy fatherly longing for one Son who shall serve thee truly to the end of the day without sin, may be satisfied in me, I will try to be that Son!"

It was with this tentative settlement that he came to his thirtieth year. He had no program. He felt that up to the present there was nothing in his life that he must undo. He carried no past sin into his future. He waited calmly, patiently, for the unfolding of the will of God.

And then the voice of John sounded through the wilderness of the Jordan and echoed in the towns of Galilee. "Prepare ye the way of the Lord," he said. "The kingdom of Heaven is at hand." It requires but little imaginative effort on our part to realize how this voice must have struck thrill and awe through the soul of Jesus. Eagerly he would listen to the reports of John's preaching brought by travelers from the south who passed through Nazareth. This prophet must indeed be sent of God, he would say. Constrained by John's great fame as a preacher of righteousness and the organizer of a pre-messianic movement, Jesus went to Bethabara himself.

The great notes of John's message rang through the soul of this auditor with a meaning more clear than they possessed even for the soul of the Baptist. He heard the note of Judgment in the prophet's message. He heard the note of Preparation for the coming Messiah and the imminent kingdom. He heard the note of Universalism—that neither caste, nor nationality nor Abrahamic descent availed with God, but a penitent heart and a purpose to do righteousness. He heard the note of Reformation—that the old messianic order was fictitious and deceptive; that a new order of penitent men must supercede it; and he saw John inducting men into the new order.

We shall resume our study at this point next week.

Editorial Table Talk

A Good Way to Keep Christians Apart

The words of Bishop Osborne, of the Episcopal diocese of Springfield, have a strange sound when he speaks of Christian unity. He says, speaking ostensibly for the Episcopal communion: "Believing as we do, unity [of churches] is not possible, and co-operation without living unity is a hollow thing, the more hollow because while professing to desire this outwardly, the churches know that unity does not exist, that there is rather a mutual distrust, a steady dislike, with sometimes fear and sometimes contempt, and that no amount of external co-operation can possibly remove these things." One cannot help asking what kind of Christian people the bishop has been associating with, that he should find in their hearts these ugly feelings toward one another. Whatever was true of past generations, it is certainly a flat misrepresentation of the Christian bodies of today, to say that among them there is "mutual distrust," "a steady dislike," and "contempt." The outstanding fact in the Christianity of our day is that this hostile and suspicious attitude is passing away, that in its place is coming a genial, co-operative, Christian temper. It is true everywhere, but more true in religion than anywhere else, that what one finds in others is the reflection of one's own thoughts and disposition. We would not deal harshly with this good bishop, but most people will believe that these elements, which he declares he sees in the hearts of other Christians, are mainly the projection of his own sectarian feelings. Usually the man who is bound down to a dogma of any sort, who takes a narrow and sectarian view of religion, himself is incapable of perceiving the catholic temper in the world around him. But they in whose hearts the spirit of brotherhood abides find brotherhood everywhere. They not only find it, they create it. And conversely, the sheer utterance of just such sentiments as these of Bishop Osborne's by Christian leaders, goes farther than any other thing to create the unbrotherly dispositions which they affect to deplore.

A Vicarious Nation

Great and luminous were the words spoken by Dr. J. H. Jowett in his Fifth Avenue Presbyterian pulpit the other day when, in a sermon on peace, the preacher flung a challenge into the conscience of our Christian nation. The congregation almost stopped breathing, we are told, while he made his plea that some nation should adopt Christ's principle of life and make itself a world savior by breaking its alliance with the carnal forces of militarism and risking its destiny in an alliance with reason and righteousness. Doctor Jowett had been showing that peace came to the individual soul because of the blood of Jesus Christ shed upon the cross. He then said: "And O, I would that some great Christian nation would, in some time of crisis, make peace by the blood of its own cross, by some sublime act of glorious sacrificial magnanimity! I would that some Christian nation would disown the axiom that the law of nations is the law of the beasts, and 'laying aside every weapon of carnal warfare,' would rely for her continued existence upon the powers of reason, 'upon the service she would render to the world,' and the testimony she would bear to Christ. You may deride the suggestion as ideal, but what am I here for but in the ministry of the ideal, and amid the fog of worldly compromises and expediencies to keep its radiant dignities in sight. And it may be, as a man of statesmanlike mind declared some years ago, 'it may be that a nation martyred for Christ's sake may be within the counsel of God,'—a nation which sought to make peace by the blood of its own cross." The same challenge was uttered by Rev. Henry Sloane Coffin, at the Edinburgh Conference, in an address which has hardly been commented upon, but which was one of the most masterful interpretations of Christianity at that historic council. This insight of Doctor Jowett's is the heart of Christ's message to our national life.

Literature Class to Visit England

In addition to the class which Professor Willett will conduct to the Orient for the study of that great mission field and Palestine, a class for special literary study in England is being formed by the University College of the University of Chicago, to be conducted by William D. MacClintock, Professor of English Literature. The class is expected to consist of about thirty students. The exact subject of study will be "Background and Environment, Physical and Human, of Modern English Literature." The important literary districts of England and Scotland will be visited. Preparations for the work, which will be made during the winter, will consist of a study of the topography of the land and the literary history of England, and the problems of literary technique in this field. Such studies have been conducted before by University classes in Greece, Rome, and Palestine, and the field work will be modeled on the field trips offered in the geology and botany departments.

Methodist Baptisteries

The simplest and most effectual way for optionist churches to stop the leakage of their members to immersionist churches is to provide facilities in their houses of worship for the seemly and reverent practice of immersion. The inconsistency between the creeds of these churches and their architecture is so apparent as to make the creed seem disingenuous. All the Protestant bodies profess to give the candidate his option as to form of baptism, but few of them provide any means by which any form may be administered except aspersion. The Prayer-book baptismal service of the Episcopal church gives immersion the precedence and is so worded as to make any other form a clear concession. But very few Episcopal sanctuaries are provided with baptisteries. The Central Christian Advocate (Methodist, Kansas City) suggests that Methodist churches should be equipped with baptisteries, and bases its suggestion upon "the solemn and inalienable right of the individual to make a choice in this matter." It says:

> "Whatever may be the prevailing custom and belief of the Methodist Episcopal Church as to the method of administering the sacrament of baptism, it is a fact that the Methodist Episcopal Church does teach that the mode is not essential to the validity of the act. We may argue against immersion, but we teach that when a person has been baptized by immersion he is not to be baptized again.
> "In the interest of the widest personal freedom and to give due recognition to the solemn and inalienable right of the individual to make a choice in this matter ought not our cities have at least one church which has a baptistery, such, for example, as the Baptists and Disciples have? We think so. Particularly among our metropolitan churches one should make this provision. It may not be used except upon the most rare occasions, but it is there, a tribute to the catholicity and religious liberty of the denomination.
> "The number of cities which have some Methodist church with such a provision for religious liberty is not so rare as some might think."

The Christian Century does not believe the individual possesses any such "inalienable right," as the Advocate refers to, but we do agree that so long as a church professes to allow such an option, it is in plainest duty bound to provide the means whereby it may be easily and reverently carried out.

The Treaty with Russia

There are various possible attitudes toward the present policy of the administration with reference to the treaty with Russia. The peace advocate may deprecate this move as having within it the possibility of international complications. The politician, who watches every move of Congress, to see what bearing presidential and congressional acts will have upon the national election next year, pretends to see in this Russian treaty affair a most significant political stroke. One fourth of New York City is Jewish. A solid Jewish vote for any political party would mean the victory of the party in the city and probably in the state. The vote of New York state has usually decided national elections. The republican policy with reference to Russia would seem to the politician to have significance in relation to the coming political contest. The proletariat element among the Jews do not think the point of the treaty is a very vital one. They insist that only a couple hundred rich Jews ever want to go back to Russia, and they only to travel, and that for the sake of the two hundred it is not right to risk complications. Such was the note struck by a Chicago Jewish paper. The large minded social student will welcome any movement which helps to break down the barriers of race prejudice. The abrogation of the present treaty does nothing for Russian Jews and may not mean much to American Jews, but it stands as a symbol of the American attitude in the council of nations with reference to favored races, and race persecutions. If such witness may be borne, without endangering the friendship of the United States and Russia, which has stood now for near a century, we would welcome the effort of our President in undertaking to secure a new treaty. If we have any witness to bear in the family of nations, it is to be borne on the subject of human rights. Our Declaration of Independence still has much of truth in it for modern needs.

The Problem of the Poor

All relief organizations are facing their annual problem of caring for the poor and destitute. Those churches which operate in the poorer sections of the cities are being overburdened just now with the work of relieving distress. The church and the typical bureau of charities are valuable adjuncts to each other. The church in the past has had the generous instinct which has urged it to bear the burdens of the poor. Historically there has been no charity save that of the church. The tremendous out-going of human sympathy along with the gifts has done good, like medicine. At the same time the churches have often lacked in discrimination. They have duplicated their gifts by the overlapping of the territory of the churches. Thus have they encouraged pauperism. The bureau of charity followed historically in the wake of the church and brought the relief of the poor into system. It furnished the point of view that it was important to cure poverty as well as relieve it. This was often to be done through education and employment bureaus, instead of the giving of gifts. The bureau of charity with its card catalogue and its classification of "cases" is apt, however, to lose its human feeling, just as the surgeon who may get to be more interested in science than in the saving of human life. The sympathy of the church must be joined to the system and point of view of the bureau of charity. The preacher before relieving the poor should find first through the bureau what others are doing. Perhaps Buffalo has the most ideal system in this country, where the bureau of charities works through the churches and thus all the relief work is unified into a system. Each church administers the relief of the bureau in a particular neighborhood assigned to it, and in which the church can have personal knowledge of the worthiness of the recipient. It is just such cordial cooperation that should exist in all modern social work. The cause of social reform gains nothing by railing at the church after the fashion of a street corner socialist, nor on the other hand does it become the church to misunderstand and abuse those outside who do the work of the kingdom.

The Bible in the Public Schools Once More

In view of the interest of Rome in her work in this country, we may expect continual agitations against the use of the Bible in the public schools. We believe it should take its place there as a great literature, and for no sectarian advantage whatever. It is difficult to understand why a book that heads the list of great writings of the world, should be laid aside in favor of inferior products. At the Illinois Christian citizenship convention, held recently in Chicago, Professor Robert H. Beattie, of Northwestern University Law School, gave a strong address on the above subject. His emphatic declaration that the Bible rightfully has a part in our public instruction called forth repeated applause. Professor Schofield's address was not only a careful interpretation of the spirit and letter of the constitution of Illinois and other states, but was also an outline of the question of legal instruction, going back to its beginnings in English history. He maintained that the recent action of the Illinois supreme court in excluding the Bible need not be taken as final. He showed how, on more than one occasion, that court had decided in favor of the Bible in cases practically identical with the last one. "Any board is free to put the Bible back into its schools if it conscientiously feels that the court has made a mistake," he said. The idea being that it would thereby give an opportunity to further test this matter. He showed that religion of the majority, under any form of self-government, is necessarily the basis of that government, and that to sever all connection with Christian fundamentals in public education is absurd. "The Illinois constitution affirmatively recommends the teaching of the Christian religion in the public schools," he declared. The officers of the National Reform Association, under whose auspices the convention was held, announced that a campaign would be inaugurated to restore the Bible to its place in the public schools.

—Professor Allen Hoben, of the University of Chicago, speaking on the work of the Juvenile Protective Association, gives the following facts: During the past year, 200 department-store girls, 200 factory girls, 200 office girls, 200 immigrant girls, 100 girls who had become delinquent, and 100 children who had been brought before the Juvenile Court, had been carefully investigated, as types of Chicago life. The result was much repressive work, in connection with the Lake Michigan excursion boats, some of the amusement parks, the outlying beer-gardens, the public dance halls of the city, wherein some 80,000 young people are dancing every Saturday night during the fall and winter, the 300 five-and-ten-cent theatres, in many of which, two years ago, deplorable conditions were found, but where only four bad films were found during the past year—these and a host of other most impressive data were brought out by Professor Hoben, showing the splendid repressive work of this Juvenile Protective Association. Much is also being done of a constructive nature.

—A recent guest of note at the University of Chicago was Hon. Saburo Shimada, Japan's foremost orator and parliamentary debater and one of the few members of the Japanese Parliament to retain a seat in that body since its institution. Mr. Shimada is also the editor of one of the leading dailies of Tokyo and the author of "Japan's Introduction into the Comity of Nations," but he is perhaps best known as a Christian statesman. He is in the United States at the joint invitation of the Japanese Christian Churches of the West, and will deliver lectures in various cities of the country. In a speech delivered to Japanese students and business men at the University, Mr. Shimada deprecated the talk of war between Japan and this country, calling it the fabrication of demagogues, and emphasized the feeling of friendliness toward America in Japan, her appreciation of the aid given Japan by American educators and missionaries, and the strengthening of the ties between the two countries which the growth of commerce will bring about.

—We learn from the Central Christian Advocate (Methodist), that "the average annual cost of army and navy for the eight years preceding the Spanish War (1890-1898) was $51,500,000; average annual cost of army and navy for the eight years since the Spanish War (1902-1910), $185,400,000; average yearly increase in the latter period as compared with the former, $134,000,000, making a total increase in eight years of $1,072,000,000. It exceeds the entire budget of the United States for 1910. It is nearly three times the estimated cost of replanting the 56,000,000 acres of denuded forest land in the United States. It is three times the estimated cost of the Panama Canal, including purchase price from the French company. The congressional library at Washington, the finest library in the world, was built for but little over half the cost of a battleship, and is maintained for three-fourths the cost of keeping a battleship afloat. The cost of a battleship would build a macadam road of approved construction between the cities of Chicago and New York."

—The Survey of religious conditions in Springfield, Ill., portions of which have been given to readers of The Christian Century in the past two weeks, proved so interesting to the united ministers' association of Springfield before whose body the facts were originally presented, that they requested Doctor Morrison, the "surveyor," to spend a second Monday with them in a discussion of the facts. Rev. John R. Golden, president of the association and pastor of West Side Christian Church, writes: "The very thorough manner in which the materials had been gathered for the paper, opened the way to discuss many vital questions regarding church work. Many of the members gave expression to the fact that this was the most helpful thing that had been done by the association for a long time. This helped every preacher to see the religious situation in the city, and it will result in good."

—Justice to Professor Alva W. Taylor's new book, "The Social Work of Christian Missions" which was reviewed in these pages last week, prompts us to add that the price, 50 cents, does not indicate the size or mechanical get-up of the volume. It is a regular $1.00 volume, but sold by the Foreign Society at half its value.

—The news notes from the Foreign Society are always interesting, but especially so this week. Secretary Rains has compiled messages from the Chinese missionaries telling of their personal situations and throwing interesting side-lights on the revolution in that country. Do not fail to read that column.

—Judging by the words of appreciation which reach the office the Modern Womanhood page is read with equal interest by both men and women. Certainly Mrs. Harrison is laying a broad foundation for a constructive treatment of woman's problems. Woman's missionary interest engages her this week.

The Evensong of Life

A New Years Talk to Those Who are Growing Old

BY A. J. SAUNDERS.

"And it shall come to pass in that day, that there shall not be light; the bright ones shall withdraw themselves; but it shall be one day which is known to Jehovah; not day, and not night; but it shall come to pass, that at evening time there shall be light."—Zechariah 14:6-7.

Perhaps you have seen that beautiful and suggestive picture of the aged man with bent form, silvery hair, tottering gait, leading by the hand a bright, curly-haired, little boy. Much has been written and spoken about the boy, his possibilities, our attitude toward him. "A little child shall lead them." But I wish especially at this time to look at the other person in the picture—the dear old grandfather, who represents the eventime of life.

"Old age is like the evening grey,
Closing around the traveler's way,
Who faint and weary seeks the road
Which leads him to a safe abode."

Everyone is impressed with the glory of the eventime. Early spring Nature paints with beautiful and striking colors, but the autumn brings the fruit. Is there a more beautiful sight than a field of golden grain waving in the breeze? With trees which lose their leaves in winter the prettiest tints of color are seen in the autumn time of their life. It would seem as though Nature had reached her perfection in the eventime. The autumn in Nature is the time of beauty, perfection and fruit. So should it be with man—at eventime there should be light.

Dangers.

Let us look for a moment at the dangers of the evening time. In the mid-day of life one is so engaged in many activities that burdens seem light, difficulties vanish, and one has little time to think of the sombres of life. But the time comes, and it seems to hasten its approach, when the dull, grey days are experienced, and time is afforded for rest, meditation and prayer. The mere fact of being old and growing older is to many people a burden. We all know of people who positively refuse to be called old. But why? Old age is a glory; old age may be the crown of life; old age may be the stock-taking time; old age should be a benediction. Do not, I pray of you, lament the fact that you are growing older every day. There are compensations. As Cowper wrote so sweetly—old age claims our reverence.

"Youth has a sprightliness and fire to boast,
That in the valley of decline are lost;
And virtue with peculiar charms appears,
Crowned with the garland of life's blooming years.
Yet age, by long experience well informed,
Well read, well tempered, with religion warmed:
That fire abated which impels rash youth,
Proud of his speed, to overshoot the truth,
As time improves the grape's authentic juice,
Mellows and makes the speech more fit for use,
And claims a rev'rence in its shortening day,
That 'tis an honor and a joy to pay."

When an earnest, active person feels that his work is done; that he is an encumberer; that he is not wanted, then is old age dangerous. Byron says that solitariness is the worst danger of old age:

"What is the worst of woes that wait on age?
What stamps the wrinkle deeper on the brow?
To view each loved one blotted from life's page,
And be alone on earth, as I am now."

This of course leads to moroseness, and the bleakest winter days of old age are those when one sits down and morosely frets over the passing of life's work days. O my brother, sister, shake off this evil spirit! Let not your sun go down behind a cloud. You have lived too long; you have worked too hard; and accomplished too much; your grey hairs and kindly, wrinkled face are worthy of more honor than to spend the evening time in frets and fears and moroseness.

The Secret of Joy.

Do you wish to know the secret of joy in old age? Here it is—Keep young, and sweet, and hopeful. Still love, and keep looking forward. Live in the future, not in the past. Dr. Alexander McLaren—the great English preacher, who recently passed away, was one of the youngest of old men. He would often go long walks with young men, and he was the most active, sunniest member of the company. His mind fed upon the helpful and invigorating food; his hands had a congenial task; he companioned with the young; he kept young; he kept growing, and so in the evening time there was light, because his soul was young, and the sun was shining. Listen to blind George Matheson:

"There is a life that remains ever young
All through the day, all through the day,
Singing at evening the song it has sung
All through the length of the day.
Love is the glory that never grows old,
Telling the story a hundred times told,
Keeping it light where the shadows have rolled,
All through the length of the day."

Joys.

Old age has its dangers, but they are or should be really insignificant to the joys of the evening time. When Napoleon in his many European wars was hard pressed, he did not command the raw boys to be brought forward; he did not ask for the inexperienced men who were fighting their first battle. No, he called for the old guard, men who had been with him through thick and thin, men, many of them, whose hair was grey, men who had lived long. They were his chief support when the battle was fiercest and most anxious. Why did Napoleon rely so much on the old guard? Because they were men of experience and ripeness, with a history behind them. A life well spent in worship to God and service to men ripens with a rare mellowness as year chases year.

Inspirations of the Aged.

What inspirations have come from aged people, and what mighty works have been done. I well remember two dear old souls who wended their way to church whenever the weather permitted in a little country town in Victoria, Australia. Their name was Church—Mr. and Mrs. Church, how appropriate. I tell you it was an inspiration to all to see those old saints in their accustomed place at the morning service. It is a beautiful tradition which has gathered around the last days of John the Beloved. He was an old man, nearly one hundred years. The dark days of Patmos were forgotten. John was again with his faithful people at Ephesus. At the morning meeting he would mount the pulpit with tottering step and as the tears trickled down his dear, worn face, would talk as a father to his people: My little children, love one another. That was all, and those simple words coming from such a heart were worth far more than thousands of the world's greatest sermons. Think of Milton—old and blind, yet he wrote Paradise Lost, and Paradise Regained. See W. E. Gladstone—the Grand Old Man, ruling the House of Commons at the age of eighty-four. Did you ever hear of Sarah Hosmer, that dear old Christian lady, whose heart ached for the millions of India? She was not in the limelight. She was only a poor, hard-working woman, but she made her life and work count for a great deal. She lived by her needle. Five missionaries already were at work in India sent out by her money, yet at the age of sixty she said: Oh, if I could send out but one more I could die happy. With her needle and thread, stitch after stitch, she worked day and night, until at last another, the sixth missionary, was speeding toward India.

Joy of the Evening-time.

These are some of the joys of the evening time. How delightful to sit out on a lawn in the cool of a summer evening. The day has been long, and hot, and trying, but good work was done. The evening time is full of rest, happy memories, and quiet joy. So should it be with the earnest Christian. The heat and labor of the day have been trying; there was hard fighting and loads to lift; the day seemed too long, but now it is evening time. God's hush has stilled the turmoil of the day. And at evening time there shall be light.

"The tallest lilies droop at eventide,
The sweetest roses fall from off the stem:
The rarest things on earth cannot abide,
And we are passing away, too, like them;
We are growing old.

We had our dreams, those rosy dreams of youth:
They faded, and 'twas well. This after-pine
Hath brought us fuller hopes; and yet, forsooth,
We drop a tear now in this latter time
To think we're old.

We smile at those poor fancies of the past—
A saddened smile, almost akin to pain:
Those high desires, those purposes so vast,
Ah, our poor hearts. They cannot come again—
We're growing old.

Old? Well, the heavens are old; this earth is, too,
Much have we lost, more gained, although 'tis true
We tread life's way with uncertain feet.
We're growing old.

We move along, and scatter as we pace
Soft grades, tender hopes on every hand:
At last, with grey-streaked hair and hollow face,
We step across the boundary of the land
Where none are old."

A Great Christian Teacher

What His Pastor Thought of the Personality and Work of Professor M. E. Bogarte

BY CLAUDE E. HILL.

Valparaiso, Ind., church has been blessed far above the average church with great leaders and teachers. We still have some of these men with us. They have made the church strong in all that makes for strength in the Christian life. But our greatest teacher was Martin E. Bogarte. He was the greatest teacher, without any exception, I have ever known.

And with his ability as a teacher, with his great, well trained and evenly poised mind, went a culture of soul, a wealth of sympathy and a power and beauty of expression which one rarely finds in men. Knowing him intimately, associated with him closely and loving him dearly, I yet find it hard to write a satisfactory interpretation of his character. He made the same impression on everybody who came in contact with him. When you saw him in action, when you heard him speak, you had the feeling that you had been in the presence of a real man, that you had listened to the voice and witnessed the movements of a master.

Work Always Well Done.

When he had finished a piece of work, whether it was teaching a class in mathematics, delivering an address on the Fourth Dimension, reading Dickens' Christmas Carol, lecturing on the character of Job or discussing the question of Immortality from a scientific standpoint, invariably in those who sat and heard there was a sense and feeling of satisfaction. You felt that the work had been well done and went away satisfied.

For more than thirty-eight years Professor Bogarte taught higher mathematics in Valparaiso University, coming here with President Brown and helping in the organization of the school. For a number of years he has been at the head of the Engineering department. During all these years of intimate association between these two men no word of difference has ever passed. They stood together, taught together in college and church, prayed together and perhaps wept together.

University and Church.

Mr. Bogarte's death is a tremendous loss to the university. He declined the chair of mathematics in one of the greatest eastern universities some years ago preferring to live out his life and do his work here where he began as a young man fresh from college. It is said that he was one of seven of the world's greatest mathematicians. His influence over the thousands of young men and women who have sat in his classes, always clear and clean, because always distinctly Christian, can never be measured or known this side eternity. Just how many young men have been turned to the ministry of the gospel by contact with this great man it is hard to say.

If he was a great teacher in the university, he was a greater teacher in the church. For more than twenty years he has taught in our Sunday-school. His class room is seated with 350 chairs, and every Sunday the room was filled. People would go early to get seats. Frequently young men and women would stand during the entire time the class was in session. And this kept up year after year. It was kept up with practically no organization and very little advertisement. A bulletin board at the university simply announced the topic of his lecture. The personality of the man did the rest.

Eschewed Popular Subjects.

And he never spoke on what are termed popular subjects. His addresses were always on great themes. They were concerned with the vital things of the Christian religion and the human soul. He went about his work of teaching Christ and the Gospel in a serious, sober way. He inspired respect, not only for his opinions and convictions, but for the cause which he represented. There were always Jews, Catholics, Mohammedans, nearly every sort of belief represented in his class. They went away thinking well of Christianity.

He never spoke without careful preparation. It was his custom to give the whole of every Thursday evening to the preparation for his Sunday's work. He was the president of a bank, the manager of a great book and supply house, taught his classes, was in constant demand as a lecturer: delivered temperance addresses; conducted funerals, and occasionally, and always to the delight of great audiences, preached in the church. But he would let nothing intertere with his Thursday evening preparation for his Sunday's work. In this he set a good example for all Sunday-school teachers. When one knew Professor Bogarte and the sort of man he was all wonder at his success vanished.

Great Men—Great Schools.

There will never be great Sunday-schools, great Sunday-school classes, and great churches, until we have great men. Or rather, wherever we have these, we have great personalities around which they are built. Here was a man with a carefully trained mind; a man with a broad grasp of truth; a man who sympathized with young people and who knew their problems; a man whose power of expressing the truth, of setting it forth clearly and beautifully, was not surpassed by any I have ever heard; a man of liberal views, yet whose faith in Christ was simple and child-like; a reverent man, a man who went straight to the heart of things, and with whom both conventional beliefs and traditions weighed but little, a man with whom the truth was everything.

A Free Thinker But Full of Faith.

Once in a while he would startle and surprise you in his teaching. But there was no occasion for alarm. He knew, as well as any man I have ever known, the sure ground of Christian faith, and he stood squarely on that. He has saved hundreds of young people from making shipwreck of their faith because he answered their questions fairly. Of course he had his doubts. But he lived by his faith. He never petted his doubts, never paraded them, never exploited them. He believed infinitely more than he doubted.

He was a constructive teacher, tearing down but only to build up. His life was clean and white as his words were wisdom and music. The Bible was the greatest Book in the world to him and Jesus was his only master.

A Prince and a Great Man.

His last day on earth was a great day. In the absence of President Brown, he conducted chapel at 8:30. He taught his classes; met an uncle, Dr. Stuart, of Kansas City at the train in the early evening; later he attended a reception of his Sunday-school class at the church. Returning home about 10:30, he died very suddenly, being cut off in the midst of a conversation which centered about the address he was to deliver on Sunday on the Lord's Prayer. A prince and a great man has fallen, and we shall not soon see another like him.

The Old Black Walnut

BY HARRIET WINTON DAVIS

"I hope Hewitt won't disappoint me. He's going to send word today," Mr. Lee said to his wife as he passed his cup for more coffee.

"What are you going to have him do?" his wife asked listlessly.

"Oh, cut down some trees, and help me finish the sheep shed, and other things. If he can give me time enough I'll have—"

"What trees, Jim?" his wife interrupted. "I hate to have any of the trees cut down."

"Well, that big walnut over in the north lot, for one," he answered, "and those scrubby cottonwoods by the line fence."

"Why, Jim!" she said, "you aren't going to cut that walnut down! Oh, what for?"

"It shades the ground too much for one thing. Nothing can grow anywhere near it. Besides, the wood is worth a pile. Black walnut's at a premium now. Dill wants to get it. He's been at me about it for a year."

"I can't have that tree cut down. Please don't do it, Jim."

"I mustn't back out now, Rachel. I've made all my arrangements. I spoke to Hewitt about it a week ago."

"Why didn't you tell me what you were planning?" she asked coldly. "Didn't you —" Then she stopped suddenly as her husband ejaculated:

"There's Mrs. Hewitt coming in the gate now. I can tell that yellow sunbonnet as far as I can see it. She looks like a perambulating sunflower." Mrs. Hewitt was one of Jim's special aversions.

Rachel bit her lip hard as she arose from the table. She was rather reticent by nature, and she seemed to have grown more remote of late; so it took some effort to plead again. "Jim, please promise me you won't cut that tree down. You don't know how I feel about it."

"Rachel, I wish you would not say any more. That tree ought to have come down long ago. It's a menace to us." And just then the yellow sunbonnet appeared at the open door.

"Well, I've caught you just in time, ain't I?" Mrs. Hewitt said. "I was afraid you'd be off to work. He wanted me to tell you he'd be on hand good and early tomorrow morning, and he can give you three days this week if you want him."

"All right, tell him I do. Much obliged," and Mr. Lee went off whistling.

"I guess we're going to have another scorcher today," Mrs. Hewitt said as she sank into the proffered chair, "I thought I'd come over before it gets so awful hot. I want to borrow a drawing of tea for dinner, Mis' Lee, if you can spare it. I'd forgot I was all out when he went to town this morning. He got started so early seemed like I didn't have a chance to think about anything. Mebbe you better let me have enough for supper, too, while you're about it," she added as Rachel went into the pantry.

"Land's sake, this is coffiee, Mis' Lee, I said tea," she ejaculated as Rachel set the cup on the table. "Oh, that's right," she said amiably as Rachel apologetically hastened to make the correction. "You're just like me—I'm kind o' absent minded myself sometimes."

Rachel tried to act interested in Mrs. Hewitt's description of the room she had been fitting up for her summer boarder, and to show proper sympathy over the illness of Mr. Hewitt's sister's father-in-law, but it was difficult. However, she was habitually of such a quiet manner that Mrs. Hewitt did not notice any particular lack.

"Well, I must be goin'," and she replaced the obnoxious bonnet with which she had been fanning herself. "Come down when you can, Mis' Lee. Seems 'sif you ain't very neighborly."

Automatically Rachel went about her work. From force of habit she put the dishes away in the right place, fed Fido and the cat, and watered the big rubber plant that was summering on the back porch, but her thoughts were far away. Once she stopped by the open door, staring out at the marvellous panorama spread before her, with eyes that seemed to see nothing. The neighbors often said that "Jim Lee had a sightly place, as sightly a place as there was on the ridge." When Rachel had come there a bride two years before, she had told him she did not see how she was ever going to turn her mind to such prosaic things as making bread, and peeling potatoes, with that exquisite picture continually tempting her to come and take one more look. The long, low stretch of irregular hills, with the higher peaks of blue mountains rising beyond, the green valley with the silver ribbon of a river glimpsing through its wooded banks, were all too alluring; but nowadays it often seemed as if it might as well be a barren waste as far as Rachel was concerned. There were days when she scarcely gave it more than a passing glance.

There was a hard look now in her eyes. "I shall hate him if he does it," she half whispered to herself. "I shall hate him." As she was arranging the books and magazines on the little table in the corner her eyes fell upon the bag of candy Jim had handed her when he came back from town the night before, saying "Sweets to the sweet." Her lip curled a little as she pushed it into a drawer. A book of poems he had given her at Christmas fell open as she was dusting it and on the fly leaf she read what she had so often read before with a tender feeling for the giver—"To my best girl—always the best." So many things seemed to be putting in a plea for Jim. The pretty vase he had brought her a week ago, the photograph that had been a surprise on her birthday, because she had so often said how much she wished she had a good picture of him. She took the photograph up now, and looked at it—into the wide apart, dark eyes that looked so true.

"Oh, Jim, how could I ever have said it, or thought it?" she wailed to herself, "I do love you—better than anything in the world, no matter what you do," and she flung herself into a chair and cried like a child.

She seemed like a child, too, with the hard look all washed out of her eyes and the grieved curve of the mouth, while soft brown tendrils clung to her forehead.

After a little she went upstairs and unlocked a small trunk that was always kept in a corner of the hall. She had often impressed it upon Jim that in case of fire they must save that trunk, "if everything else in the house burned." Carefully she took out one thing after another, handling tenderly the packages of her mother's old letters, and the box that held some of her left-behind little trinkets that Rachel could hardly bear to look at even yet. She hesitated a moment at a small pasteboard box. She did not often look at that either, but she opened it now, carefully unpinning the tissue paper from a tiny ring of golden hair. "It seems as if hair was just made to keep, it's all one can keep," she whispered as she held it to her face while a spasm of pain distorted her features. Then she put it back in the box with the little bunch of lilies of the valley—grown sere and yellow since they were taken from the tiny hands that held them loosely. "But it's like opening a grave," she said.

At the bottom of the trunk was a handful of letters, tied with a blue ribbon. "Blue is true," she remembered Jim's quoting once whe he saw her tying them with it. She when he saw her tying them with it. She one she put everything else back into the trunk, and slipping the letter in her dress went downstairs. She looked at the clock. Two hours before it would be time for dinner! She bathed her flushed face with cold water, till all traces of tears were gone and in a few minutes she was hurrying down the dusty road.

Everything was ready for Jim when he came in at twelve o'clock from the field. Nothing was said about the trees, and all went on as usual, except that he had to hurry back to his work earlier than he generally did, for it was a busy time with him.

All that afternoon she kept looking out of the window as if expecting some one, and when the mail carrier's wagon stopped in front of the house she hurried to the door and was waiting on the porch by the time Mr. Searles had got the gate open.

"That's all I've got for you now, Mrs. Lee, I'll do better by you next time," he said jocosely as he handed her out a letter.

Rachel laid it at her husband's plate, and went into the sitting-room to lie down a little while before it was time to get their supper. She felt so tired. She did not mean to go to sleep, only to rest a little, but the drowsy air, the shrilling of the grasshoppers, and the booming of the bumble bees in the tall flowers growing by the window were all too much for her and she awoke two hours later to see her husband bending over her with an anxious face.

"You aren't sick, are you, Rachel," he asked tenderly as she looked at him in bewilderment after her heavy sleep.

"No, no," she stammered, "I just thought I'd lie down for a few minutes, and I guess I must have fallen asleep."

"It does look that way," he said with a grin. "Well, you're going to keep right on lying down, and I'll get supper. I'd rather do it than not," he protested as she sat up on the lounge and began smoothing her hair.

"Any mail?" he asked later as Rachel was testing the potatoes in the oven. They did not seem quite done, and she bent over them as she answered, "Yes, there's a letter for you, by your plate."

"If he doesn't promise it now I'll never believe again that he loves me," she murmured as she closed the oven and went hurriedly onto the back porch, upsetting poor little Fido who was standing on his hind legs in front of the screen door, begging in his most persuasive fashion, but he only looked at her in surprise as he regained his normal attitude.

Jim opened the envelope and drew out a letter that felt soft and worn as if with much handling. It commenced "My darling." He looked puzzled but read on for several lines. Then his face flushed a little under the tan. One paragraph was encircled with a very fresh looking blue pencil line: "There isn't anything in the world that I would not do to add to your happiness. Selfishly, too, perhaps, for I could not be happy myself if I didn't think you were."

He sat a minute after he had finished the letter, gnawing his lip under the thick brown moustache.

As he went into the kitchen, Rachel was leaning against the open door with her hands clasped tight in front of her. Her eyes were shut as if she dared not look at him, but he went straight to her and took her in his arms.

"Dearest," he said, "I'm just as ready to do anything to add to your happiness now, as I was when I wrote that letter. "Don't you know it?" And then as she did not answer, "Don't you know it?" he persisted.

"But Jim," she said, raising her head, "then how could you refuse about the tree? How could you when I cared so much?"

He hesitated a moment before he answered in a low voice: "I thought it was best for you, dear. That was the real reason."

"Best for me," she repeated sadly, "Oh, Jim, I didn't tell you why it means so much to me, but I can see from there where the baby is, and that's why I love to sit there and dream about her. Before she came I used to think what a nice place it would be for a child to play, and how we would pick up the walnuts together. Sometimes I can almost make it seem now as if I had her, as if she was sitting there with me." Her tongue seemed loosened, and the words flowed in a torrent.

Jim smoothed her hair from her heated forehead with a gentle hand.

"Rachel," he said tenderly, "I know more about it than you think I do. I've watched you there with that look in your eyes till it cut me like a knife, but it isn't good for you, dear. I got to thinking the other day that if the tree was gone and something planted there, you'd have to give it up, and perhaps you could gradually get your mind on other things more.

"Rachel," he continued after a moment's silence, "don't you ever think it's been hard for me, too? Most men want a son, but you know how I'd always wanted a little daughter. When she came, somehow I never thought she might not stay, and those first few days when you and she were lying in that room like two little angels, I was just about too happy to live, and I used to lie out under that tree and think about the times we'd all have together. I'd even looked ahead and thought what a comfort she'd be when you and I were getting old—a daughter sticks by you so." Then he ended with a half laugh: "So you see I've had my dreams too."

Rachel was silent but she clung to his hand.

"There's another thing about that tree," he said presently. "I don't think I'm very sentimental, but it's always seemed a little different to me from any other, ever since we sat under it and watched the sunset the first night I brought you home here—but I don't suppose you remember," he said with a slight sigh.

"Yes, I remember," she whispered.

He lifted the little hand he held and pressed it softly to his lips.

"Well," he said after a moment, "I guess we'll have to let the old tree stand. I don't know that I could cut it down now myself."

Rachel reached her hand up, and softly stroked his face. "I won't go there any more, Jim," she said, "not till you say I may. I know myself it's bad for me, but I didn't know how you cared for it, too. That will make it easier, somehow. It shows how selfish I am, doesn't it?" she added ruefully.

"Jim," she said suddenly, as they were sitting at the table, "you said black walnut was so valuable now, and you could get a lot of money for it."

"I had to give you some reason, Rachel," and he smiled at her, "but I guess you know I'm not very mercenary."

"Oh, I know that," she said quickly, "but I was thinking perhaps I ought to want to have it cut down. You need so many things for your work."

"I don't need them bad enough for that," he answered her.

When Mrs. Hewitt came over to return the borrowed tea, she told Rachel that Ed thought Mr. Lee was awful foolish not to let him cut down that big black walnut tree. "Why, he says Dill offered him a hundred dollars for it. Just think what you could do with that hundred dollars, Mis' Lee. And land sakes, what's a tree anyway?"

Denominational Dissatisfaction

"The Future of Methodism: A Plea for Insurgency."

Insurgency is in the air, also in the Republican party, and now it is breaking out in the Methodist Church, according to an article which appears in Zion's Herald (Boston) under the subhead above. It is a stirring, breezy plea, and the writer, Rev. William Charles O'Donnell, Ph. D., leaves no doubt in the mind of the reader that he is a sure enough insurgent. In part, the article is given below:

Insurgency Is Inevitable.

The Methodist Episcopal Church is in the 127th year of its honorable history. It has more ministers at work, more churches in use, and more communicants enrolled than any other Protestant body in the world. Its activities are manifold. Nearly 50,000 students are attending Methodist schools, and approximately $50,000,000 are invested in school properties. All sectarian considerations aside, the denomination is one of the nation's greatest assets. The conservation of such an instrumentality for good is as truly a matter of general concern as is that of imperiled natural resources. Forests, coal deposits and arterial waterways are to affect the future of the Republic less fundamentally than will this historic institution that acknowledges no meaner ambition than the spreading of scriptural holiness over the land.

Plain Truth.

The man who promulgated the theory that Mona Lisa's beatific smile is after all but the sickly grimace of a consumptive, is probably given to sinister imaginings. The infected Eddyite denying disease is cruelly deluded. What is needed is the plain, unimagined, ungarnished, and unconcealed truth. Here it is, in Gradgrind fidelity: Methodism today has a dissatisfied ministry, a disloyal membership, a complaining constituency and such an alarmingly low rate of increase as to be practically at a standstill. In world-wide Methodism the rate of increase has fallen off eighteen and one-half per cent in the last twenty years. The increase of 791,713 in membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1909 was less than four per cent, and in 1910 the rate was still lower. Our appeal is not to statistics, however. Face to face with new and complicated problems requiring exalted statesmanship and unwonted strength, the church is unprepared to make the advance. The future of Methodism is, therefore, in jeopardy.

Changed Attitude Toward the Ministry.

In a series of interviews under circumstances best calculated to encourage the expression of honest convictions, but one minister declared an earnest desire to have his son choose the same occupation. The others were emphatically opposed. In a still larger number of interviews with leading laymen on the same subject the opposition was unanimous. It was not so in early days of which memory bears blessed record, when a father of the old-fashioned sort was wont to say: "My boy, I would rather have you preach the gospel than to become president of the United States." This changed attitude toward the "high calling" is symptomatic. Methodism is straitened. The watchers say she is sick. Invalidism two is un-Methodistic. Anaemic Methodism is an anomaly. Something is radically wrong, and radical treatment is imperative. It helps not a whit to insist that other denominations are likewise halting. Disease in my neighbor's family makes disease in my own none the less dreadful, nor is medicament any the less desirable.

Change Needed.

As the years have passed many modifications, but no revolutionary changes, have been made in the unique system of administration under which the Methodist Episcopal Church came into power. The ancient and honorable scheme of quarterly, annual and quadrennial conferences, district and general superintendency, itinerating ministry and probationary membership has weathered the storms of many decades. Spasmodic legislation has been avoided. Conservatism has had its way and done its work. A good way and a good work, no doubt. But the time has surely come for a thorough re-examination of every feature and detail of the Methodist economy. Devotees of precedent, unable to understand why this venerable mechanism cannot be as effective in the present as in the past, revere it as Confucians revere their ancestors. Their attitude is condemned by all such as having caught the spirit of the times have interpreted it as the will of the Lord and are ready for readjustment. There is no hope but in insurgency. Insurgency is already a reality in motive and spirit.

Bishops and Superintendents.

Two things yet are needed—a leader and a program. Given the program, kind heaven may be trusted to thrust forth the leader. The shuttlecock episcopacy is not a complete success. It is not commending itself today to men apt in questions of economy and efficiency. The district superintendency, until recently known as the presiding eldership, is thoroughly discredited in many sections of the vast territory over which it is established. This dual system of supervision costs the church over $1,000,000 a year in salaries. Results are not commensurate with the expenditure. Insurgency must compel a better plan—a plan which may or may not involve a reduction in expenses, but which must harmonize better with modern ideas of business management and give sure promise of advantage to the ministry and to the churches in their heroic efforts to serve and to save humanity. It is suggested, for instance, that one real bishop, gifted in leadership, Moses-like, strong in strategy, Gideon-like, holy in life like the illustrious saint of Assisi, withal a brave and brotherly man, permanently settled in a diocese, will accomplish more in the line of effective supervision and wise correlation of forces than a score of district superintendents with only sub-episcopal power and a brief tenure of office.

Itinerancy Not Eliminated.

The time limit was eliminated from the Methodist itinerancy some fifteen years ago. But the itinerancy was not eliminated. A Methodist pastor receives an appointment every year. He may remain, let us say, ten years in a given church only by being appointed to that church ten times, possibly by ten different bishops, and after ten different requests on the part of church officials, and with the accumulated honors of ten different receptions under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid. Peculiar arrangement, isn't it? It produces peculiar results. At every annual conference the appointing power, the one man invested with absolute authority, the bishop, the autocrat if he pleases, is met with requests, demands, and threats, and sometimes subtle suggestions which are not very distantly related to the bribe family. And this from men who think they know what is best for the churches they represent, but who seldom manifest any interest whatsoever in the welfare of the other churches to be affected by the appointments. Then what about the pastors for whom no requests are made? If they have the manliness worthy of their calling they will not ask to be sent, nor will they want to go where they may not be welcome. They are simply caught in the flying machinery and are whirled into far corners with wounded pride and sore hearts. They may submit as sweetly as their state of grace will permit, and persuade themselves they are thus worthily serving God. They may turn politicians and search out the secret places of the wires that may be worked to their future advantage. Is this the best system of pastoral provision possible to the great Methodist Episcopal Church? The man who says so is no friend to Methodism. The insurgent demands something better.

Pauperizing Salaries.

It will require a very strenuous kind of insurgency to establish justice in the matter of ministerial support. The highest average salary in all the conferences and missions of Methodism in the United States is that of the New York East Conference, with its splendid metropolitan pulpits, $1,542.90. There are but twenty-four averages between that highest figure and the thousand dollar line. Twenty-nine conferences are actually below the $500 average, the lowest of all being the Pacific Chinese Mission, at $69. These statements are deduced from the statistical reports in the Methodist Year Book for 1911. The figures symbolize tragedy. They drip with the heart's blood of the poverty-slain. When the Methodist Episcopal Church directs its wisdom and strength sufficiently to this problem, tragedies will give place to triumphs, and groans will be turned into glorias.

It is only as we die to the world around us and to the self-life within us that we realize the glory of this mystery. If we were more tranquil in our behavior, quiet in our movements, self-poised, willing to wait only upon God, pausng before answering, lifting up our hearts before opening our letters, seeking direction before making engagements or forming plans, we should be conscious of the rising up within us of another life, of our reproducing something of the glorious life he lived once among men.—F. B. Meyer.

Topics of the Time

Headed by Speaker Champ Clark and the entire Missouri delegation, the Democratic House of Representatives supported by a Republican vote passed the Sherwood Service pension bill last week. The bill, if it becomes a law, will add upward of $40,000,000 to the government annual expenditures. The Secretary of the Interior has estimated that it will add $75,000,000 to the pension roll if the 400,000 veterans eligible take advantage of the increase. But for the support of Republicans the measure, which proposes to grant pensions ranging from fifteen dollars to thirty dollars a month to all veterans of the Civil and Mexican wars who served over ninety days, would have been defeated. The bill would establish the following basis of pensions: For service for ninety days to six months, $15 a month; from six to nine months, $20 a month; from nine months to one year, $25 a month; more than one year, $30 a month. The number of soldiers in the Civil War on the pension roll on July 1 last, was 529,884. The aggregate amount of pensions paid to them during the year was $101,425,534. The number of deaths during the year ending July 1 last, was 35,243. The number of soldiers who will be available for pensions on Jan. 1 is estimated to be 509,000. For all wars, the pension bill of the United States is $153,686,000. With new legislation a certainty, there is bound to be even a larger expenditure for some years to come.

People complain of hard times when the butcher and the grocer and the doctor send in their bills, but the money blown in at Christmas seems as "big" this year as ever, in fact a little bigger. Each day there is leaving the city more than $100,000 in Christmas postal money orders, and each day more than $500,000 worth of money orders are being cashed in Chicago. The trade in foreign money orders broke all Chicago records Monday, Dec. 11—the last day to catch the Christmas ships—when 659 premiums were paid. The aggregate amount was slightly over $9,000. Express companies report an unprecedented shipment of small packages abroad. Foreign money orders also have had an unusual sale.

The agents in the British Isles of the prominent American meat packers, who have held large government contracts for the supply of meats to the British army and navy, have received the following notification from the war office: "Pending the ultimate result of the legal proceedings in the United States against certain meat packing firms, it has been decided by the British government, that none of the firms involved shall be invited to tender for army supplies." The decision of the government is the result of opposition of labor and advanced radical members of parliament to the American trusts. The contracts heretofore given by the war office to American firms are now expected to go to Argentina meat packers. Officials of the war office explained that the government action was in accordance with its regular policy. In case any company with which the government dealt became involved in serious litigation, the government immediately refrained from giving contracts to that company while the litigation continued. British firms received the same treatment under the same circumstances. There is little doubt that the admiralty will follow the same lines as the war office.

The Filipinos are progressing. Baseball is a feature of reform work in the Philippines, not only affording healthful excitement to the natives, but causing them to abandon the time honored sport of cock fighting, according to Francis W. Shepardson, associate professor of the University of Chicago. The Philippine native is receiving from the American the three things he needs most, according to Prof. Shepardson. "One is a common language to take the place of a half hundred tongues that prevent easy intercourse," he writes. "Another is the interchange of ideas through more frequent association which is being hastened by means of baseball and other athletic sports, which are calling attention from the cockpit and the gambling attendant thereon. The third necessity is a common national feeling." The writer further says that efficient men and women have supplanted the corps of miscellaneous and doubtful teachers who first volunteered for the service from the United States.

Evidence that the postoffice department is losing $4,000,000 of revenue annually on second class matter to the express companies by not enforcing the postal monopoly created by statute, is in the hands of the house committee on expenditures in the postoffice department. This disclosure will be used to combat Postmaster General Hitchcock's proposal to double the 1 cent a pound rate on periodicals in order to reduce the alleged deficit of $64,000,000, which Hitchcock says is incurred by the handling of second class matter. The postmaster general already has eliminated $1,000,000 by shipping magazines by freight, and it is contended that other reforms would wipe out the alleged deficit without increasing the rates.

Why Men Stay Away from Church

A group of laymen, members of the South Congregational Church, Chicago, of which Rev. H. E. Peabody is pastor, nearly a year ago organized an enquiry to find the actual needs, social and religious, of the men living within a mile of South Church, with a view of finding what that church could do to meet those needs. They employed an efficient man who went not as a church solicitor, but as an investigator, asking the co-operation of these men in ascertaining what the church might best do to meet the needs of those who are nonchurch-goers. His report reveals the fact that the churches have been very inefficient in keeping their hold on their own members, and in following them up when they move to other places. The drifting process is going on both without and within the line of reguar church membership. The report continues, "The surest, most outstanding fact shown by our canvass is that the average man in this community is socially isolated. Some of us are crowded and oppressed with social duties, but it is one of the contradictions of the great city that for the average man it is perhaps the loneliest place in the world. People who were well known and of consequence in the towns or villages from which they came do not succeed in adjusting themselves to their crowded neighborhoods here.

"'This is the first place that I ever lived in,' said one, 'where I have not known somebody.'"

"And another woman said: 'We have found it best, on the whole, not to know our neighbors.' These are not poor people, but as a usual thing they have no community of interest, no social relationship with their neighbors. The criticisms against the church were few, but the prevailing one was this, 'The church is unsocial.' The weightiest fact proved by our inquiry is this: Our neighbors are lonesome. They are hungry for friendship, for brotherhood. And this conclusion is not guesswork; it is a fact proved by our assay of the lump of humanity in this district."

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Organized Missionary Work Among Women

Adoniram Judson and the little group that accompanied him to India in 1812 were the first fruits of America of foreign missions. Mrs Judson was of equally ironic fibre with her husband, and her courage, her sufferings, and her early death, are among the noblest and most pathetic pages in missionary annals. But neither Mrs. Judson, nor the other women who went to the foreign field in those days, ever thought of any separate or independent work—they went out only as wives and members of the families of male missionaries.

Confined to Local Churches.

The women in the church at home were as responsive to the missionary appeal as men, and their interest found expression in gifts from individuals and from small societies. These first woman's misionary organizations, however, were confined to the local church, and attempted no work beyond raising little sums of money which were turned over to the controlling boards of their congregations for disbursement. Their lack of education, of financial independence, and of social freedom, unfitted them for a wider service as yet. The names of some of these societies give a pathetic insight into the poverty of their resources—Female Mite Societies, Female Cent Societies abounded, and their main assets seem to have been butter and eggs, and rags. But with the opportunities for education that were opening to them, and their entrance into the industrial world, they were receiving the training which fitted them for a greater work for their Master and their fellow man. They also doubtless felt the same call of the poor and needy, and the impulse to organization outside the churches that has been noted in previous articles of this series. The fulness of time was dawning for a larger and more effective service than had yet been known by Christian women.

The Magic Word.

The magic word that was to break the barriers of custom and tradition that bound them was first spoken by a reformed missionary to a little group of English women in 1834. He told of the seclusion of oriental women in harems and zenanas, where no man might enter, and the impossibility of their attending public assemblies where they could hear the gospel. Only a woman's hand could open their prison doors, only a woman's voice could tell these souls in bondage the story of the blessed Jesus who honored woman as not one else had ever done. He pleaded for unmarried women to go out as missionaries because the mothers and wives on the field were too burdened with home duties for this service. His message found quick response in his hearers, and they formed The Socity for Promoting Female Education in the East, now seventy-five years old. When he reached America, he told the same story to a body of his countrywomen, and their hearts responded as quickly and warmly to his message as had their sisters in England; but when they attempted to organize a general society for distinctive work among women of the Orient, they found that the time was not yet ripe for the movement; the same spirit obtained in the church that we have already noted when women attempted organized work for temperance, for anti-slavery, and for educational, industrial, and political rights for women. The opposition against organized religious work among women was even stronger than against social and philanthropic movements; Scriptural authority was quoted; and the much abused and mis-applied Pauline phrase was constantly hurled at them: "Let the women keep silence in the churches." The women reluctantly yielded to this opposition from their church boards—so the work was postponed for a quarter of a century.

Hour Had Struck.

But at the close of this period, the full, consummate hour had struck for the women of the church to launch out into the deep of world evangelism. In 1860, when the shadows of coming war lay heavy over the land, the same call from the women of the East to the women of the West was uttered in New York City by the wife of a Baptist missionary, at home on furlough; the call had grown in depth and volume with the passing years; now, it was not only a plea for the prisoners of the harem and zenana, but the futility of attempting social and religious uplift in any land with the home untouched, was also urged. Not only the men, but the mothers of men must be reached before the social structure could be cleansed or Christianized.

A Second Attempt.

A second attempt at organization was successful. In 1860, the Woman's Union Missionary Society was formed.Whether the opposition was lessened by the spirited and effective debates, or whether the woman in charge had so grown in strength that they could ignore it, we know not—probably both causes obtained. The vitality and timeliness of the movements were shown by the fact that even the throes of civil war could not arrest it. Auxiliary societies sprang up in many different churches in other cities; and this new legion in the army of the Prince of Peace went marching on throughout the four dark years of wasting war.

This movement was especially significant in two ways:—it enlisted a new and almost unused element in the spiritual forces of the church, for the advancement of the kingdom of heaven over the whole earth—and it was an earnest of the closer union among Christians that missions were to bring. It is an increasing joy to woman, that the first step in her distinctive work for missions was along the way of Christian union.

Denominational Boards.

At the close of the war, there came a new development in the work, and this was the organization of the denominational boards. This was not because of any division, or sectarian spirit among the women, but was an effort toward more effective organization, and greater practical efficiency. These boards took for their pattern and inspiration the societies formed at the beginning of the war; from 1868 to 1874 practically all of the large Protestant churches organized women's boards of missions, and the work entered upon a new and splendid era of service and achievement.

In the wider fields now opened, it was soon found that all missionary work was so correlated that they could not engage in one branch of it without sharing in closely allied enterprises. The call of eastern women to their sisters in western lands was like the first notes of a melody, which soon deepened into the rich and varied harmony of a great symphony.

Medical Missions.

The zenana visitors who went as teachers and evangelists to bring light to darkened minds, soon found the need of those who could carry healing to diseased bodies as well. As the seclusion of heathen women prevented their being taught by men, it also cut them off from the services of the male physician—so the woman medical missionary was evolved. Many hearts and homes have been opened to these followers of the Good Physician, which could have been reached in no other way, and their healing the diseased body has opened the way of healing the sin-sick soul.

On the mission field as at home, the ministry of teaching has fallen largely into the hands of women—the orphanages, and homes for widows and destitute women could only be tended by those of their own sex—and so on through the whole gamut of missionary effort; all the lines of work are so intimately connected that entrance into one necessitates entrance into the other.

This policy of expansion has become so marked a feature of women's missionary boards, that now the agencies controlled and supported by them comprise all the usual lines of missionary effort. I. W. H.

Women of Note

—Mrs. Arthur Stannard, known to the reading world as John Strange Winter, died last week in London after being confined to her bed for the last five months as the result of an accident. She was born at York, Jan. 13, 1856, the daughter of Rev. Henry Vaughan Palmer. Some of the stories she wrote were dramatized and became popular in Europe. Among them were, "Bootles Baby," "Houp La," and "The Truth Tellers." Mrs. Stannard was clever all around and made a study of hair and skin culture. She was the proprietress of many toilet preparations.

—By the terms of the will of Mrs. Jan K. Sather, who died in Oakland, the University of California is to receive $500,000. The will stipulates that $200,000 is to be spent for a granite campanile tower, 300 feet in height, to be erected in the center of the university grounds.

—In the opinion of Mrs. William Howard Taft, the list of the greatest women the world has produced should read as follows: Queen Victoria, Rosa Bonheur, Jeanne D'Arc, Maria Mitchell, Cecile Chaminade, Jane Austen, Charlotte Bronte, Frances Willard, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Florence Nightingale, Susan B. Anthony, George Eliot, Mme. Curie, Margaret Fuller, Queen Elizabeth, Queen Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Lucretia Mott, Louise, Prussia. Mrs. Taft's selections are the best yet.

—Miss Blanche Stuart Scott, the aviator, has been chosen treasurer of the new aeronautical society of women, which was organized a few weeks ago in New York City. There are at present only twelve members of the club, and Miss Scott is the only one who has even attempted to fly. The president of the club is Mrs. Hugo C. Gibson, and the secretary, Miss Daisy E. Ball.

—Jenny DuFau, the beautiful new lyric soprano of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, was born in the charming old city of Strasbourg, capital of Alsace. There her vocal training began, and there she made her first public appearance—in a Bach oratorio.

THE CHALLENGE OF CHRIST

The Story of a University of Pittsburgh Professor Who Enters the East End Church in That City and Who Dedicates his Talented Life to the Ministry. Why a Strong Man Chooses the Neglected Calling.

BY JOHN R. EWERS.

One evening not long ago, a clear, steady voice called me over my phone and requested an interview. Within the hour I faced in the study the professor of Public Speaking of the University of Pittsburgh. The glow of fine enthusiasm was upon him, the spell of holy purpose held him, for he had caught the vision of the Christian ministry. He came to enquire about the opportunities for real service in that calling, and to learn more clearly the teachings of our great and growing communion. His training and former church affiliations prepared him for the union crusade. Our message to a divided world gripped him, our program satisfied him.

Hails from Wisconsin.

Coming from Wisconsin he had never been impressed with our people until he came in contact with our local church. Another professor had suggested that he might be interested if he should attend our church and as a result he occasionally came into our services. The freedom, the broadness, the life of the appeal of the Christian church held him.

The conversation brought out the facts that he was a graduate of Beloit College, where he had been captain of a class football team, won the state oratorical contest and also second place as orator in a contest between eleven states, had been on winning debating teams, had worked actively in the Y. M. C. A., being chairman of the devotional committee the last year, and thus in a broad college experience had laid foundations for community usefulness. Moreover, having been cast upon his own resources at the early age of thirteen, he had learned to make his way in the world unaided.

Teacher of Public Speaking.

Leaving college he taught Public Speaking in the Michigan State Agricultural College and two years ago took up his work as teacher in the same department in the University of Pittsburgh, where his work is highly commended. His broad sympathies led him to teach also in the Institution for the Blind and in the night school of the Y. M. C. A.

I found that he loved his work. He appreciated his opportunity to mold young men in his classes. He taught them to think reverently and vigorously, to become eloquent by whole-hearted consecration to a worthy cause, and to make the most painstaking and accurate preparation in vocal, bodily and mental training.

In a day when so few successful young men are turning to the neglected profession of the preacher, why should this man consider our calling? I pressed this question and pressed it hard, for I have a feeling that no man should enter the ministry unless he must cry out, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel." Therefore his answer was deeply interesting.

Thoughtful Reply.

Carefully, thoughtfully, clearly he made reply. And this is the substance thereof: "I do not wish to become a minister for the sake of the financial reward. I appreciate the fact, that no doubt, a marked sacrifice will be imperative. My present financial outlook is promising, but I face the sacrifice. Nor do I wish to become a minister because of the greater prominence it may afford, for it may be some time before I could hope to equal my present situation. And certainly it is not because I am seeking an easy job, for the faithful work of the ministry must be far more exacting than teaching in a university."

What then could be the impelling motive? And in his noble answer many a young man may find the heroic note. "I desire to become a minister because the times demand the fearless preaching of Christian conduct and character, because a study of myself leads me to believe that my training prepares me to impress, persuade and convince men concerning Christ's claims upon their lives, and finally, because I wish to do the largest and strongest work possible, I wish to invest my talents and influence so as to secure the greatest returns, the good is enemy of the best. Preaching seems to offer me a greater opportunity than teaching. Or to put it in other words, it is nobler to teach men how to live than how to speak."

A Worthy Recruit.

These statements satisfied me that here was a worthy recruit for our ministry, and so I asked him to make a statement before the congregation on the night of his baptism. This he did with such quiet fervor, with such deep earnestness, with such intellectual clearness, that all were delighted. His speech showed his loyalty to Christ and his allegiance to our program.

Within a few months he will be available for some church which is looking for a strong man. His name is Arthur E. Fish, Pa., His age, which is highly important in Pa., His age, whics is highly important in these days, is twenty-nine.

Let us analyze this case. Here is a mature man entering the holy calling in the proper manner. I have little sympathy with all this clamor for more ministers and no agreement whatever with that soft appeal which would lead unprepared men into the ministry. We need fewer and better ministers. It might be a blessing to the church at large, if one-fourth of the preachers of all denominations would take up the cry, "Back to the farm." Agriculture covets many of these dear brethren—pardon the slur upon an honest and noble calling. Many of the trades would be enriched, as well as the profession of the ministry, by the departure of many half-hearted, unconvinced, inefficient parsons. Let the people come together around real leaders, men who know Christ, men who are religious, men who love their brothers, men who have the courage of their convictions. Fewer preachers and better, that is the idea.

Prophets Needed.

What we need is the prophet. The preacher must live near to God, must hear his voice, must fearlessly give the message the times demand. The refined, colorless, cold and proud dilettante on the one hand and the ignorant, coarse clod-hopper on the other, have no place in the pulpit. I decry lovelessness on the one hand and ignorance on the other. I know full well that Amos, the farmer, and Peter, the fisherman, became the great preachers of their times.

In the multitudes of young men, there are certain choice souls who seem to be set apart for the high calling of the ministry. The home culture, the natural bent, the schooling, the play of mighty influential personalities—all seem to combine to fit them to become prophets. No power on earth could silence such men. They laugh at small financial returns, being big souls. They glory in hardships, being of heroic mold. They crush trivialities and ride over meannesses, being strong knights of the Holy Grail indeed. They despise narrowness, being fashioned in generous ways. Courage and gentleness, strength and tenderness, wisdom and simplicity, humanity and divinity, love and firmness, reverence for the old, and openness to the new, the love for folks and the fondness for books, the thunderous voice of denunciation and the wooing tones of persuasion—all of these diverse elements blend in one strong personality, making a prophet. These are men, bearing the marks of God, who should enter the ministry. The cheap, soft, wearisome creature who becomes a preacher because he thinks the job is easy, or the position affords a cheap honor, or because he could not make as much at anything else—this miserable wretch is banished by the nobler test. The preacher must be a great soul.

Professor Fish enters the ministry because he believes that his training prepares him for the exalted task, because he wishes to make his life, with every year and every ounce of energy, count for the very most, because he believes with all his heart in Christ and is convinced that the world needs Christ's life and teachings. He enters the Christian church, after careful study of its history and doctrines, because he is convinced that in this communion he finds the simplest, plainest and most satisfying message and the freest opportunity to declare it to the waiting world. Thus does a strong man enter our fellowship and become a prophet among us.

Notes

—An English vicar, writing to Everybody's Weekly, says that the curse of English Nonconformity is the control of the pulpit by the pew. "State establishment," he adds, "is angelic compared with pew establishment because of the money bags." England is some distance from America, but there are cases in this country where the vicar's remarks would apply.

—One of the heads of the United Charities in Chicago said last week that there are 20,000 homeless men in Chicago today "on the fringes of poverty," who are staying at cheap rooming places and are dropping out—many a day—to live at the lodging houses of the city and the United Charities. Many of the city's poor are now asking for relief who a while back had no intention of seeking help. A steel trust lawyer has just completed a $500,000 pearl necklace for his wife. There is something wrong in the social order of affairs—a wide gap somewhere.

—The Washingtonian Home, now self-supporting, is carrying on a grand work in behalf of the drunkard in Chicago. A celebration in recognition of 40,000 men cured of the liquor habit in the last forty-eight years was held last week at the home.

—Miss Marie Brehm, well known to the temperance world, has just returned from European countries, where she made observations as to the progress of anti-liquor investigations and education. She said Germany was farther advanced than other nations in promoting total abstinence. "The conclusions of the scientists," she said, "that have devoted money and years to the the study of the effect of alcohol on the human system, reported at The Hague convention, are that alcohol is as injurious and disastrous to the highly sensitive mechanism of the human body as grains of sand would be to the sensitive mechanism of the watch."

—Declaring that more than fifty lives had been sacrificed to lynchers in this country within the last six months, the federal council of the Churches of Christ in America at Pittsburgh last week adopted resolutions calling on Christian churches to put an end to the practice and to protest vigorously against all forms of mob violence. The resolutions, which commend the press north and south for "its brave and fearless attack upon lynchings," were introduced by Bishop A. Walters of Philadelphia.

—The Year Book of the Methodist Episcopal Church, just published, reports a membership of 3,518,099, which is an increase for the year of 32,116, or a little less than one per cent. The Sunday-school enrollment is larger than the church membership by about 450,000 and shows a very healthy increase for the year. The Epworth League, on the other hand, has decreased in membership during the year by over 20,000. The total property value of the church, including parsonages, is upward of $200,000,000.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Thomas E. Israel, assisted by George A. Butler, is in a meeting at Sweetwater.

O. M. Eaton's revival meeting at Sailor Springs had numbered six additions at last report.

The Harlow meeting at Carthage resulted in seventy-five additions. The pastor is W. W. Denham.

The pastor at Bellflower, L. S. Harrington, has resigned to begin in another pastorate the first of January.

A revival meeting of short duration was held at Allison Church by B. F. Cato, with unusual edification to the congregation.

S. Elwood Fisher and Elmer E. Rice are expected at Keithsburg for one weeks' series of meetings. The pastor is L. F. DePoister.

D. H. Shanklin of Normal preached at Pleasant Plains on a recent Sunday, and it is reported that he has received a call to that church.

The congregation at Mt. Pulaski will be led in a meeting, beginning late in January, by the pastor, J. Newton Cloe. The pastor will be assisted with a singer.

The union revival meeting at Pontiac, being held by the Scoville Evangelistic Company, had reported more than five hundred conversions and other additions.

The revival meeting at Columbus, conducted by Evangelists Sword and Kay, had passed the twenty mark in number during the first few days of the meeting. The pastor is F. B. Taylor.

In slightly more than one week, the meeting at Atlanta had yielded thirty-six additions, thirty of them being confessions. R. H. Newton, the pastor, is being assisted by Evangelist R. W. Abberley.

Evangelist Irwin and wife are having excellent results in their meeting at Ashland. Beside large congregations attending, there had, at the end of the first week, been a number of additions.

A revival meeting is being held at Neoga by Evangelists Hill and Knowles. This is a new field, but the community is affording the evangelists a large hearing and a number of additions have already resulted.

Canton Church, where J. G. Waggoner is pastor, has recently concluded a money-raising campaign to clear the church of its indebtedness. The results met expectations, securing seven hundred dollars, which will pay all bills against the church.

During the last year, at Summum, there were twenty-four additions to the church, under the ministry of G. W. Burnett. The pastor and congregation are happy in their relations, and the second year of the pastorate has begun auspiciously.

Evangelist J. M. Rudy of Indiana is to assist John R. Golden and the West Side Church, Springfield, in a revival meeting after the first of the year. This church and pastor are looking forward to the evangelist's coming with unusual expectations.

D. W. Conner has received one hundred additions into the church at Palestine in less than a year. Fifty of these came during a brief meeting just closed, which lasted for two weeks. Considerable interest is being manifested here on behalf of a new building to accommodate the larger congregations and increased Sunday-school.

The congregation at Oreana re-dedicated its remodeled building with the assistance of J. A. Barnett of Galesburg, and singing evangelist, C. B. Knowles. The total cost of remodeling was fifteen hundred dollars, which was more than provided for. The present pastor is Fred A. Galliger, whose ministry is exceptionally appreciated, both within and without the church.

The Chandlerville pastor, Dr. B. O. Aylesworth, is to offer a series of lectures during January at the University of Illinois. Dr. Aylesworth has been in the pastorate for only a short time recently, having prior to this time been in educational work as president of the State Agricultural College in Colorado, and before that as president of Drake University. He is exceptionally qualified therefore, as a minister, to be introduced to the scholastic atmosphere and circles of the state university.

The Depew-Peters Campaign

Clarence L. DePew, state Sunday-school superintendent and H. H. Peters, field secretary of Eureka College, have just closed a two weeks' campaign in the interest of the Sunday-school work in Illinois and Eureka College. They visited the following places: Arthur, Sullivan, Palestine, Kansas, Newman, Rantoul, Milford, Watseka, Paxton, Englewood, Gibson City, Clinton, and Mt. Pulaski.

Speaking of the tour Mr. Peters says: I have studied the theory of religious education more or less for ten years. It was my interest in this field which led me to take up the work for the enlargement and endowment of Eureka College. The two weeks' campaign with Mr. DePew deepened my convictions in the work I have been trying to do and made me realize as never before the importance of a closer affiliation between the college and the Sunday-schools. I do not know exactly what will come from this campaign. But I do know this, that Mr. DePew went on his journey with a clearer idea of what we are aiming at in Eureka, and my understanding and appreciation of his work was likewise increased. We expect to work on the problem and consult men who have made a specialty of these various lines of work with the hope that somewhere down the road we can bring about results that will give the college a larger constituency among the young people and help the Sunday-schools to secure better teachers and a firmer grasp upon the problems of Christian education in the local congregation. I believe this tour is the beginning of some real aggressive work on the part of both our college and Sunday-school to bring them together. Two things are absolutely sure. First: The college needs a constituency, and the Sunday-schools can furnish it. Second: The Sunday-school needs teachers, and the college can furnish them. It may be that the work will not be done as it should be until we devise some plan by which we can have Sunday-school extension courses in our churches. If the colleges could work out something along this line it would be worth while."

A further campaign is being planned by these leaders taking in other cities of the state.

The Bondurant Lectureship at the State University

The late Thomas H. Bondurant of DeLand, donated to the cause of Christian education in Illinois, large sums of money; among these bequests was one of twelve thousand dollars, the design and condition of which gift are stated thus:

"The income from this fund shall be used annually and forever as follows: Six-tenths thereof for establishing and maintaining a Bible Lectureship at Champaign, Illinois, within reach of, and for the benefit of the students of the University of Illinois, and four-tenths therof for the purpose of establishing and maintaining such Bible Lectureship at such of the cities of Illinois containing State Normal Schools as may present a favorable opening and opportunity, within reach of and for the benefit of students attending such State Normal Schools." The Bondurant Fund was bequeathed to the Trustees of Eureka College, to be administered as set forth above. The trustees of the fund planned this year to provide two series of lectures. The first of these was given December 3 to 8, by Dean W. J. Lhamon of the Bible Department of Drury College, Springfield, Missouri. The second series will be given at Easter time by Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore.

The Bondurant Fund became available several years ago and the first series of lectures was given in 1906 by Professor Herbert L. Willett. Since that time the will has been in litigation and not until this year have the proceeds become available for active work again. We of the University community believe no man among us could have been chosen by the trustees of the fund to have re-inaugurated the Bible Lectureship work in more masterly fashion than was done by Professor Lhamon.

Two series of lectures were presented. The afternoon lectures on the general subject, "Comparative Religions" were presented at the University and at the invitation of the University. These were largely attended by faculty men and students. They were constructive in every sense always leading up to the incomparable superiority of the religion of Jesus Christ. The evening lectures under the general topic, "Studies in the Character of Christ," were given at the church and were also largely attended by both students and University men and by local people as well.

Mr. Lhamon's presentation of both series of lectures was masterly in every way. Scientifically he made his appeal to the academic mind, building up piece by piece the invincible argument leading to the acknowledgement that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. His reasoning throughout was lucid, and his presentation kindly and found response in the appreciation of all classes who heard him. From many sides we hear the sincere hope expressed that he may come again to the University. Many members of the University have freely said he helped in very definite ways to the strengthening of faith in Christ. Dean Lhamon combines the scientific spirit and methods of modern scholarship with the charm and grace of the highest type of popular lecturer. The efficiency of his work was manifest in the fact that though it was an exceedingly busy season nearing the Christmas holidays and upon the eve of the Mott evangelistic campaign at the University, the attendance grew at both afternoon and evening lectures until the end.

The members of University Place together with the community of Christian workers about the campus of the University of Illinois unite in the hope that Mr. Lhamon may come again in the near future, and the gratitude of all is cordially expressed both for his kindly ministry, and for the great and good man who made "The Bondurant Bible Lectureship" a possibility.

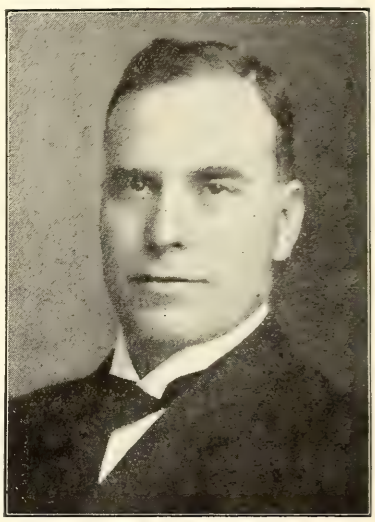
Chicago

Chicago Russian Mission.

Our work among the Russians of Chicago is thirteen months old. The first missionary worked only three months. Basil S. Keusseff, our present missionary, was called to the work, January 1, 1911. He soon succeeded in building a good night school in which foreigners were taught English and starting a Sunday afternoon gospel service.



Basil S. Keusseff.

He now has audiences of from fifty to eighty men. Another religious meeting being conducted on Lord's day evenings for those who want to know the way of the Lord more perfectly. He conducts four sessions of night school and a boy's club every week, which are well attended. Although it is too early to expect definite results, yet a number of souls have been added to the church.

The choice of Mr. Keusseff by the Chicago Missionary Society to work among the Russians is a wise one. First, because the Russians are comparatively new colonists and not yet well organized. Secondly, Russia is a great missionary field itself which the Disciples must soon enter. We must not forget that in Russia there are 1,000,000 people who hold religious views similar to our own, and refuse to use denominational names.

On November 12, 1911, the Disciples organized, in the city of Chicago, their first Sunday-school among foreign-speaking people. The record of the school for the three Lord's days shows the following: Attendance, 31, 63, 67; offering, $.94, $1.24, $1.17.

The Metropolitan Church of which Evangelist Scoville is minister-at-large and the John De Witt Hull resident minister, has furnished the teachers and all the literature and record blanks. The church has loaned sufficient chairs for the present need. Beginning with the first of the year there will be a need of about fifty copies of the American Standard revision of the New Testament in the Russian language, and about the same number in English for the children who speak our language. Such a supply will enable the school to study the International Lessons on the Life of Christ and become familiar with the Book itself.

The Even-Song of Life

Young People.

We can never pay our debt to those who have piloted the way for us. The Chinese see many things to admire in our western countries, but this they hate, and can never understand—the disrespect of our children and young people. In China they reverence old age; grey hairs and a bent form and wrinkled face are marks of honor. They worship their ancestors. I make a plea for the respect of old age.

Live in Present and Future.

On the other hand you whose sun is going down, keep ever young; wear a smile; live in the present looking toward the future. O, do not let soreness, moroseness, a grumbling, dissatisfied spirit eat like a canker into your soul in the evening time. No; it must not be. Take this sweet message with you this New Year's day. At evening time there shall be light. The light which issues from a life well lived, and work well done. The light which always accompanies happy and helpful companionships. The light which comes from constant fellowship with Jesus—the dearest friend of the aged. The light which is yours from the rich, full promises of our Father God. In the evening time there shall be light. It is a promise. It is yours. Take it. Let no one rob you of your evening joy. May it ease the heavy heart. May it strengthen the weary body. May it light up the fading sight. Go on, dear soul, the best is yet to be. Hope thou in God, and he will bring it to pass. Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning. Earth has no sorrow which heaven cannot heal. "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee. The Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." At evening time there shall be light.

"There is no sadness in life's eventide
When God is there: His hand doth gently guide
The weary pilgrims on their homeward way—
Toward the land of everlasting day.

Life stretches out before thee—not behind;
Look on—not backward, so thy soul shall find.
Green pastures in old age—a pleasant place,
Bright with the shining of thy Father's face."

Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing. You need every one of this splendid list.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

OF PERENNIAL INTEREST TO DISCIPLES.

HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS ADVOCATING CHRISTIAN UNION

Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic literary product of the Disciples' first century of history. Thousands have been sold and the volume is enjoying a steady demand. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Barton W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Price, $1.00.

Z. T. Sweeney says:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

AN ILLUMINATING BIT OF AMERICAN CHURCH HISTORY.

THE EARLY RELATION AND SEPARATION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES

By Errett Gates, Ph. D.

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 35c.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature."—The Christian Worker.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—The Congregationalist.

A FASCINATING RELIGIOUS STORY.

ALTAR STAIRS

By Charles J. Scofield.

An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound and illustrated. Price, $1.00.

"A most excellent serial."—J. H. Garrison.
"An admirable story."—J. J. Haley.
"A most forceful and healthful piece of reading."—Z. T. Sweeney.
"If one begins this book he will not put it down until the very satisfactory end is finished."—Christian Observer.
"A strong book and worthy of unqualified endorsement."—Religious Telescope.

BOOKS BY HERBERT L. WILLETT

BASIC TRUTHS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH

Cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75c; paper, 35c.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style.

"For me the finest chapter in the book is that on the Resurrection. This gets one back into the lives of the Apostles on that Resurrection morn. It is a historical study indeed. One hears the tread of conquering hosts and the beating of the wings of twelve legions of angels."—P. C. Macfarlane.

"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

OUR PLEA FOR UNION AND THE PRESENT CRISIS

Cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50c. Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

STUDIES IN THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL

Cloth, $1.00.

One of the volumes in the Constructive Series of handbooks. It is prepared for the use of classes in secondary schools and in the secondary division of the Sunday-schools. It presents the entire material of First Samuel with explanatory notes, questions, and illustrations. It is used in a large number of Sunday-schools, in grades of the ages of eleven to fourteen.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE BOOKS

Cloth, $1.25.

An introduction to the literature of the New Testament. The book is a work of collaboration with James M. Campbell, D. D., a prominent Congregational minister, who supplies the interpretative material in connection with each of the books of the New Testament. A handbook widely used by individual students and classes.

THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF JESUS

Cloth, 35 cents.

A small handbook prepared for classes desiring to study the outline of the life of Christ, and a brief statement of the most important teachings of the Master. It is based upon the entire material of the four Gospels arranged in chronological order.

THE PROPHETS OF ISRAEL

Cloth, 35 cents.

A handbook on this, the most important theme of the Old Testament. It gives a survey of the history of prophecy in Israel from the beginning of the national life to the close of the Maccabæan age. It has been widely used in institutions of education and in Bible classes, and has passed through several editions.

THE RULING QUALITY

Board, 35 cents.

A small book of sixty pages dealing with faith as the conquering quality in human life. The theme is interwoven with comments upon the quest of the Holy Grail as illustrated in Mr. Abbey's panels.

Church Life

Dorchester, Neb., church recently paid off an $800 debt. Harley Swift is pastor there.

The churches of the Southeast District of Minnesota held a convention Dec. 13 and 14.

Ira C. Smith is closing his pastorate at Tingley, Ia., and is open to receive a call to another field.

Norwood, Cincinnati, church is building a new house of worship. W. J. Shelburne is pastor there.

J. M. Rudy is in the midst of a successful meeting at Danville, Ind. There have been twenty-six additions to the church.

The W. J. Minges meeting at Junction City, Kan., reports 333 persons added in ten days of invitation.

The new church house at Kalona, Ia., costing $9,000, was dedicated last Sunday by Evangelist William J. Lockhart.

The Hannibal, Mo., church, George A. Campbell, minister, recently reopened its house of worship after expending about $10,000 in repairs and improvements.

William H. Knotts, of Panora, Ia., has taken the pastorate of Highland Park church, DesMoines, succeeding J. McD. Horne, who went to Charleston, Ill.

E. L. Powell, of Louisville, is to hold an evangelistic meeting for Wabash Avenue Church, Kansas City. L. J. Marshall, pastor, beginning the first Sunday in February.

Mrs. W. J. Wright, wife of the pastor at Enid, Okla., underwent a serious operation recently. At last reports her husband was grave but hopeful of her recovery.

N. D. Webber closed his work Dec. 17 at Morristown, Ind., with seven additions. Sixty-six have been added in the two years of his ministry. The church desires to locate a man at once.

M. B. Madden writes that since his return to Osaka, Japan he baptized two men. These are the first baptisms since returning from furlough. "I had had four funerals and needed the joy of seeing men come into the kingdom."

B. T. Lively is just closing a two and one half years' ministry at Burr Oak, Kans. In that time the church has built and paid for a splendid new property. Mr. Lively will be ready for located work again after January.

Fourth Avenue Church, Columbus, Ohio, has had twelve additions lately. They begin a meeting January 7. W. E. Adams of Danville, Ill., is to be the preacher. T. L. Lowe, the pastor, is closing his third year there. During the three years the church has paid of its indebtedness and put $2,000 additional into improvements.

Ernest C. Nicholson, pastor at Portage La Prairie, Manitoba, where W. J. Minges recently held a revival resulting in over 600 conversions, says that it is as hard to win one soul there as to win five in the United States and computes that this meeting was the equivalent of one with three thousand additions held on this side of the line.

The death of Sydney Clark Haley, eldest son of J. J. Haley, formerly associate editor of The Christian Century, brings sadness to the multitude of friends of this family. The young man died at the home of his parents at Lodi, Calif., Dec. 5. The editors join with our readers of the earlier days in earnest condolence to the bereaved parents.

Central Church, DesMoines, Ia., Finis Idleman, pastor, will observe New Year's day by keeping open house in the afternoon. Years ago the officers of this church kept the day by dividing in twos and calling upon the membership. The plan for this season is a revival of the spirit of the older custom. An orchestra, refreshments and all the accessions of a reception will be part of the entertainment.

The forty years of Christian service of Prof. Amzi Atwater were recognized by the Bloomington, Ind., church in bestowing upon him the office of pastor emeritus recently. Prof. Atwater had served this congregation as pastor a number of years and upon accepting a professorship in the state university at Bloomington has continued for many years as an office-bearer and earnest worker. Joseph C. Todd, the pastor, expressed for the official board and the membership the profound affection in which Prof. Atwater is held.

The Florida state convention was held at Ocala, recently. Dr. W. T. Moore, of Eustis, president of the convention, delivered an able and youthful address, whose significance was enhanced by his nearly eighty years. Secretaries Grant K. Lewis and Robert E. Hopkins of the American Society, J. H. Mohorter of the Benevolent Society, and E. E. Elliott of the Brotherhood, participated in the sessions. Mrs. M. E. Harlan, secretary of the C. W. B. M., also was present and made an address. The work in Florida is prospering.

An unusually convincing sign of unity is that given by the Adel, Ia., ministers, who began a union revival meeting on the plan of the local pastors doing the preaching in rotation. After the meeting had been going one week it was found that of the twenty-one conversions twenty had responded when Pastor Musgrove of the Disciples' church did the preaching. Instead of showing petty jealousy, all too likely in such a situation, the pastors voted to make Mr. Musgrove their evangelist to do all the preaching until the meeting closed.

The "World" is to be in Cincinnati in March. This great missionary exposition was first held in London in 1908, and was called "The Orient in London." It occupied the Royal Agricultural Hall, an immense structure in the city of London. Last spring a similar exposition was held in Boston, known as "The World in Boston," which attracted between 350,000 and 375,000 visitors from all over New England. It is expected that "The World in Cincinnati" exposition will bring to Cincinnati thousands of visitors from Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky, and probably lesser number from points more remote.

The second number of the Christian Union Library, issued by the Commission on Christian Union, and edited by Peter Ainslie, D. D., of Baltimore, has just been issued. The contents of the number are as follows: (1) Work of the Commission of the Disciples of Christ. By Peter Ainslie, D. D., president. (2) Christ, Not Doctrine, the Only Basis of Christian Union. By W. C. Bitting, minister Second Baptist Church, St. Louis, Mo. (3) A Little Catechism for Christians. By Amos R. Wells, editor Christian Endeavor World. (4) An Open Letter to the Christian World. By J. H. Garrison, LL. D., editor Christian Evangelist. Copies may be obtained of the Christian Board of Publication, St. Louis.

O. W. Winter closed his first year's ministry with the Christian Church of Creston, Ia., Nov. 26. The services of the day were supported by fine audiences, and three members received into the church. There were 201 in the Sunday-school, compared with 151 a year ago. The Men's Bible class numbers 27. The C. E. is in a flourishing condition. The annual report of the financial secretary was the most satisfactory for several years. The church building has recently been repainted and other improvements made. There is money in the treasury to pay all improvement bills and a neat balance for further work. The C. W. B. M. Day address delivered by the pastor was greatly appreciated by the auxiliary. Two fine young men presented themselves for baptism at the evening service Dec. 17. The outlook for the new year is encouraging and the church membership is hopeful. Mr. Winter recently preached two sermons at Kent, Ia., and baptized four persons.

Mrs. Elvira Whitman Durham, wife of the venerable J. Durham of Irvington, Calif., passed to her reward the day after Thanksgiving. A letter from her husband tells of his grief and sets down many significant facts with reference to the life of Mrs. Durham. She was the first student to be enrolled in Abingdon College, Illinois, September, 1854, graduating in 1858. In 1871 she and her husband moved to California, where in 1872 they were the first in that state to introduce the International Sunday-school lessons. In 1874 the first young people's prayer-meeting ever held in California was held at her suggestion in her house. She organized the first auxiliary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions on the Pacific coast, in 1876. She has been a teacher in the Sunday-school all her life and a number of ministers, among them Frank S. Ford, of San Francisco, and W. L. McCullough, of Washington, point to her influence as determining them to choose the sacred calling. Her life was filled with good deeds. She was blessed with four children, all of whom are living and honoring her by Christian lives. An even fifty Thanksgivings this aged couple had passed together. Her death was the triumphant entry of a great soul into the presence of God.

Suspense Broken

On December 8, the Foreign Society received a letter from Dr. Wm. M. Hardy, Batang, Tibet, written to his father, J. W. Hardy, Nashville, Tenn., under date of October 11, which caused the society and his father, also the parents of J. C. Ogden and wife, in Kentucky, the greatest anxiety. It will be remembered that Dr. Hardy and J. C. Ogden and wife are located at Batang, Thibet, also Dr. A. L. Shelton and wife who are now at home on furlough, but who expected to return to the field in January. The following is the letter to which reference is made:

Batang, Thibet, October 11, 1911. Dear Papa: The situation here is more serious, the trouble having hit Litang this afternoon. We leave for the south tomorrow. Our plans are to go to Tali where we can get supplies and money both of which are now cut off. How long we will be gone I have not the slightest idea, but I do not expect to see Batang for six or eight months. Do not worry when you get this for then we will be safe if there is safety in flight, otherwise, it will all be over and too late to worry. We are assured that Yunan (Province) is peaceful, but if we cannot reach Tali, we will turn east and go into India. Our party will consist of the three Ogdens, four Edgars, Cunningham and Clements of Tachienlu (who arrived today), and myself. We are all well and hope to have a pleasant trip. When we get to a telegraph office I will wire Cincinnati. If anything should happen to me, what is left of my life insurance money after debts are paid, I want it divided into three parts, one-third to the F. C. M. S., one-third to you and one-third to Victor and John."

A letter of the same date and of the same import was also received from James C. Ogden on December 18. It is a distance of thirty-five days from Batang to Tali where they expected to cable this office. More than two months had passed and we were in the greatest suspense. Today this suspense was broken by the following cablegram:

Shanghai, December 22, 1911. You must detain Sheltons. Roads in most dangerous condition. Ogden leaving on the 25th by the Japanese-San Francisco Line.—Signed "Ogden."

It will be very gratifying to the many friends of these missionaries to know that they are safe. The time of furlough for the Ogdens was due in the coming spring. Dr. Hardy may come now, but it is not probable. Many have been in earnest prayer for the safety of these and others in China.

The Herbert Moninger Memorial

Herbert Moninger was called home June 21, 1911. In many ways his work will constitute his best memorial, but hundreds of friends are urging a special memorial in his honor. It is proposed to endow a Chair of Sunday-school Pedagogy at Bethany College, as this memorial, and some publicity has already been given to this enterprise. The executive committee chosen to conduct the raising of the necessary fund, $25,000, propose that a special day be set apart on the last Sunday in January.

There are many reasons why the enterprise suggested is most appropriate. It is distinctly a Sunday-school enterprise and affects principally the Teacher Training cause with which Mr. Moninger will forever be identified. Bethany College is chosen because this is the Alma Mater of Herbert Moninger and as the oldest of our schools in a peculiar sense belongs to the whole brotherhood. We have a similar chair in the college of the Bible at Lexington fully endowed, and a few of our other schools are doing efficient Sunday-school work without endowment. It is thought that the endowing of a second chair now will mean many such departments in our colleges in the future.

The enterprise has received hearty approval everywhere. A few offerings have come in unsolicited. It is to be hoped that on January 28, every Bible-school in the land will take some offering for this important work. The fund asked for is very meager, $25,000. For this Bethany College proposes to maintain the enterprise, the interest on the fund alone being used. The college furthermore agrees to bear all incidental expense in raising the fund so that every gift will go directly and permanently into the memorial fund.

Every school or individual that gives $5 or more will receive a beautiful certificate containing the pictures of Mr. Moninger and the famous old college building. All donors of $100 each or more will have their names placed upon a bronze tablet that will be on the walls of the room occupied by this department.

The Divinity of Christ

is the new work on religion by EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES which bids fair to be even more generally discussed than the same author's "Psychology of Religious Experience."

It is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

Yeuell at Walla Walla, Wash.

Herbert Yeuell has just closed the largest and most satisfactory meeting ever held in Walla Walla. The campaign lasted just four weeks, resulting in 303 persons coming forward by statement or confession.

The great auditorium holding fourteen hundred people was crowded again and again, oftentimes many being turned away. Mr. Yeuell more than met the highest expectations of the church both in regard to his success and the character of his preaching. He satisfied the most conservative in his loyalty to the Word of God and the principles of the restoration movement. Many came from other churches to be baptized. Many other churches of the city received additions. If the evangelist had been conducting a union meeting he could hardly have been kindlier in his attitude to other churches. One of the prominent ministers of the city declared in an address before the ministerial alliance that he had looked forward to this meeting with a fear that it would disturb the friendly relations that had grown up among the churches, but he wishes to say that if there is a sore spot in any church or heart in this city he had not learned of it, and wished to praise the Christian Church for its good judgment in bringing such an evangelist to the city who had helped every church in it.

Herbert Yeuell is a Greek in culture, a Roman in organizing and directive power, and an Elijah in religious enthusiasm. His versatility is remarkable. He knows no rut. Every sermon is fresh in thought and treatment. His overflowing fun is contagious, while the deep fervor of his soul moves the great audiences like waves of the Spirit of God. He is master of evangelism, having an expert knowledge of every detail of all that goes to make a great meeting. The larger the throng the greater master he is.

Mr. Yeuell addressed a full house in the "Grand Theatre" under the auspices of the "Men and Religion Forward Movement," another great meeting that filled the church with women only; while his lectures on Saturday evenings were always attended by more than could be accommodated. On Monday night following the close of the meeting a reception was given in his honor, where he received an ovation. Sentiments of praise were roundly applauded again and again.

Mr. Archie Allen Bailey, who led the singing was a great factor in the success of the meeting. His fine voice was at its best in his solos, while his chorus work was excellent and won unstinted praise. With his pleasing personality he is a worthy assistant of the strong evangelist.

The feeling in the hearts of all the people as well as the minister, is that both evangelist and singer will return for another meeting.

The personal work in this meeting was mainly done on the outside, inasmuch as the evangelist is not in favor of the pushing of this feature in the congregation. In the latter part of the campaign a few chosen persons did some effective work in this regard.

Minister.

The Latest News From the Missionaries of the Foreign Society in China

F. C. Buck, Luchowfu, Ahnwei Province, under date of November 10, says: "At this time we are flying the rebel flag (revolutionists) on every street and in every store. The imperialists (Manchu) have all fled to the American consultate at Pekin. We foreigners in this city (Luchowfu) have suffered no harm at all, not even from the local thieves, for they were about to burn and rob and loot the whole city, so the story goes, but they did not touch us with a finger, for which we thank the Lord."

Under the date of November 12, Dr. E. I. Osgood, writing from Chuchow, says, "Owing to the fighting going on in the Yangtse Valley, some of our women and children have been sent to Shanghai by the strong advice of the consul in charge. The men are staying by their work and stations."

F. E. Meigs, Shanghai, November 19, writes, "We are all well and rather enjoying the excitement. It is terrible, this cruel war, but the struggle is for the right and will end right I verily believe. We expect Nankin to fall into the hands of the revolutionists in a few days and we hope to go on, as we feel sure that that will be the beginning of the end. These are great days in which to live. I am glad to be here where I can see what is going on and watch the trend of events. I shall be the better prepared for my work when it comes. We know you are praying for us and the Chinese Christians."

Dr. E. I. Osgood writes from Chuchow, under date of November 13, "Our missionaries had all remained by their stations until last Friday (Nov. 10), when the Nankin consuls ordered the women and children of that place, to a place of greater safety. So they were sent to Shanghai (Nankin is 200 miles north of Shanghai). I received word today that the Luchowfu (where we have a station) women and children have been sent out. Mr. Hunt (located at Chuchow, forty miles from Nankin) is planning to take his family down to Shanghai tomorrow. I am writing you another letter as to the imperative need

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

THE SIGNS INDICATE AN UNPRECEDENTED INCREASE IN VOLUME OF ORDERS FOR THE WINTER QUARTER of sending some money to defray this extra expense."

"Shanghai went over to the revolutionists very peaceably, so did every important city on the Nankin-Shanghai Railroad, except Nankin. Nankin is practically the only important city below Hanchow which is not now in the hands of the revolutionists. It appears that the great bulk of the Chinese are heartily in support of the revolutionary movement for it means a new and better China.

"Nankin, having a comfortable settlement of Manchus, has not gone over so easily, so far, there has been no great bloodshed, not more than 200 killed in the battle (at Nankin) so Brother Garrett informs us. But thousands upon thousands left the city when they saw the trouble coming and business there was brought to a standstill long before the fighting began. The schools have all closed and the pupils sent to their homes. (No less than 1,000 pupils in all our schools). The Christians are naturally very anxious and clinging to the missionaries. But we have been able to go on with the building of the new church. The carpenters are working day and night and we hope to have the church finished by the end of the year. We have no reason for fearing disturbances here. The only danger possible will be from rowdy or scattered groups of defeated soldiers passing through, and the city is taking every precaution against this danger.

"We learned by the Chinese papers that Nantungchow (where we have a station) has also gone over to the revolutionists, as have most of the other places. Wuhu (where we have a strong station) has also gone over. We presume their flag will soon be flying over Nankin, Luchowfu and Chuchow, and we trust the latter two places will do it peacefully. Out of it all we look for a new and better China and one which will receive the gospel much more willingly and completely."

Mrs. Macklin, writing from Shanghai, November 12, says, "We are wel here at Shanghai at present and Dr. Macklin is in Nankin, very happy to be of service in such a great time in the history of China."

F. C. Buck, writing from Luchowfu, where we have a mission station, under date of November 14, says, "The hospital will probably continue at full blast, but the other work may slow down for a while until things get more settled. The American consul at Nankin sent word that all foreign women and children should leave for some port, and today Doctor Butchart received a letter from the British consul at Wuhu, telling him, yes, commanding him, to bring his family and come to some place where there is protection (Wuhu is fifty miles from Luchowfu). He immediately took his family and the rest of the ladies, Mrs. Brown and Miss Favors, to Wuhu, and the Chinese people thought that something was going to happen sure, and some of Miss Favor's women came to us who were left to ask if we were going to stay, that they were scared and had trusted to the religious services. It occurred to me then as never before that we are in a real sense, the shepherds of the flock after all."

"Dr. E. I. Osgood, writing from Chuchow, under date of November 18, says, "I am writing this in the midst of the revolution, uncertainty and times of great changes. We, my family and myself, are still at Chuchow. Nankin missionaries have all been ordered out by the consul with the exception of the doctors who were doing Red Cross work. Indeed, the consul sent a roundabout order to us strongly advising the removal of the women and children to a place of safety. We looked over the situation carefully, long and prayerfully; indeed, have not yet fully decided whether we will continue to stay here; but at present we are staying by. Our greatest, and perhaps only danger, is in straying bands of defeated soldiers wandering this way from Nankin, forty miles away. We would be shut off from the rest of the world for a time and they might try to do harm to the town.

"We are hoping matters will clear up soon. While we are not carelessly exposing our lives and have taken cognizance of every possible danger, yet we believe the situation warrants our staying on at present. We are building the new church and doing finish-work about the hospital grounds. Meanwhile our presence in the city is a great comfort not only to Christians, but many others. For us to leave would strike terror in many hearts and they believe as long as we are here the danger is fairly small. For us to leave would look very grave to them."
